But people in general did not trouble themselves to enjoy this sensation. The residents of the town and the military had no knowledge of such a thing, and it need hardly be said that the visitors of a season from Paris and London cared only about dressing for the hour of dressing for the promenade, and dressing for the table d'hote dinner and the ball at the établissement, and so on. Churchill, however, with the recklessness and desire for new situation properly belonging to his country, soon and often explored the old ruin, and enjoyed the sensation of being surrounded there by the fiere-looking, brimless hats of the fishers, but he could no longer have Lucille at her house, the lovers, I grieve to say, turned their grins and were right run to ruin a new and unconcenial purpose—they meeting it a rendezvous, and had some sad, sweet meetings and partings there. Every day Churchill is going away—actually going for Heaven knows how long—going to war, and going to death! Just the old story—old in the days of Andromache—in the days of the Crusaders; as fresh and real as ever in the hours of Arcadia and Castlewood—the lovers go to the war, the woman remains at home and weeps and hopes and prays and is sick at heart.

The sun was sinking red and fierce behind heavy clouds as Churchill and Lucille met here of Lucille, and they yet stood safe from observation on the summit of the unbroken ramparts of the old fort. They were renewing for the hundredth time or so in that one meeting their mutual pledges of eternal fidelity.

"You will write often, often, to your Lucille?"

"I will never fail, dearest. It makes me happy to think that your letters at least will reach each other. That dear, good girl will take care of that."

"Yes. Is she not a faithful creature, that good Nanette? And I will lay fresh flowers every morning on our lovers' grave, dear."

"Your father, dearest, will not object to that, however he may now dislike me."

"Oh no, no; he is too good and kind—"

"Kind!" repeated Churchill, rather bitterly.

"Kind in his way, now and then. He do judge him harshly by my sake: He will change—he will yield—he will be sorry and glad when you are gone."

Churchill shook his head sadly.

"And dear," he said, with his left dimmed and moist eyes, "I must return home, my loved one. My father will expect me."

He looked down over the broken rampart and stated.

"Lucille, dearest child, we have allowed the time to go by—at least I have—and the sea has risen far above the doorway."

"Mon Dieu!" she screamed with a wild alarm, and she looked over the wall and saw that what he said was too true. "Oh, what to do? My father, what will he think?"

"M'amie, it is but a short delay—two or three hours or so, and I will be with you again. You are safe here—as safe as if you were at home."

"Oh, Frank, you did not mean this—you did not keep me purposely?" she added, anxiously in his face.

"I, love? I never thought of it; my mind and memory were wholly wrapped up in you. But now that we are made prisoners here, I can not—I will not—I am very glad that I can indeed! I feel rather grateful to the sea. This is our last meeting."

"If my father should know! If the people should hear!"

She paused perfectly white and trembled. Her fear and agony were intensely real. Poor Churchill, in his joy, had not been long enough to have realized sufficiently to himself the cramped and manacled position of a French girl. The exclamation of Lucille's face now told the cruelty of the situation only too plainly to his mind. Interest by the sea which imposed on Churchill and Lucille, and the strip of strand between the fort and the cliffs was now a green channel of dashing bold. Lucille clasped her hands and looked almost as one in despair. Churchill had read Octave Feuillet's "Romance d'un Homme Homme pauvre," and began to think the only course left for him was to imitate the hero of that famous story, and to brave the rod of the father and his chances, thus at least securing Lucille from scandal.

Perhaps Lucille had read the book too, and guessed what was passing in her lover's mind, for she suddenly flung her arms around him and held him to her heart with a fond and enfeebled.

"No," she exclaimed, "never! You shall not risk your life in that sea. Better any thing than danger, love. I can easily and safely get to shore, and then I will send help to you."

"Never! I will leave this place if you do. You shall not go. Ah, no, Lucille, the sea has seen us, and sends help. Look yonder—a boat!"

Indeed, a small boat had put out from the shore some distance off, and having gone a little way out to sea, apparently to get out of the force of the ground-swell, was now making for the fort. It came nearer and nearer, and the lovers watched it with eyes of hope and anxiety. At last they could see that there was only one rower in the boat, and that it was the fisher-girl, Nanette.

The sea was not high enough to allow the lovers to get into the boat from the roof.

"Vite! vite! the lower windows!" cried and gesticulated the stalwart fisher-girl, as she stood in the tossing boat, firm and steady as if her feet rested on the beach itself. Churchill, who had a little of the artist's soul, could not refuse even at that moment to admire the strength and lithe and composure of her attitude; the supple, strong form which had never been cursed by a corset; the round, straight limbs which high-heeled boots had never disjointed.

"Nanette!" he exclaimed, a flash of joyous humor succeeding to the pain of the previous moment, "you are worth ten thousand lectures on Woman's Rights! Come to my country, and you shall take the lead of Lucile Grahame!"

The speech was wholly lost on poor Nanette, who could not and showed not by a sign that half intelligible to Churchill; but what he could not quite understand he guessed at. The fisher-lass now seated at her oars pulled as if she had enough to do to keep the boat from being dashed against the old fort, for the sea was very rough, and the last flashes of angry red across the heavy cloud-banks in the west seemed to promise a very bad quarter of an hour to come.

Churchill hurried Lucile down the broken stairs. Even the lower floor was almost water run. The centre had all given way, and fallen through. A portion of the flooring still clung to the side where the staircase was, and thence you might creep along a narrow ledge to the window which looked on the sea. But the window was large enough for any one to get out of, and it had a wide and strong ledge on which two or three persons could cling at once. The sea was now nearly level with this window.

Lucile trembled for a moment as she reached the step of the staircase which was level with this crumbled floor, and she saw the narrow ledge along which she would have to travel in order to reach the window. Churchill, holding her hand, knew that she startled and shivered.

"Indeed, Lucile, you are nervous! You are afraid! Do not venture. Come back to the roof again, and wait it out there. It will be hours, and you will be safe there. Nanette will stay with us. Come back!"

"No, no, it is impossible! I dare not. Oh, you do not know what would be said! I am not afraid to go and hold my hand. You will see that I am not afraid."

"Turn your face, then, to the wall, dearest. Come, that is right! Courage! Why, this ledge is broad enough to dance on. You should see Bkotin! How happy he would be in this pretty little feet. There would be room enough for the feet of two such Cinderellas on a side walk like that. Good again! Let me bind Nanette calling? Capital lungs that girl has. Now, then—one—over—more—give me both your hands, ah, vous y êtes!"

Thus talking and laughing—partly to keep up her courage, partly to relieve his own vivid excitement—Churchill crept along the ledge, firmly holding Lucile's hand, and watching with keen, eager eye, that treacherous step through the growing darkness, every step he made. Where he could get a single grip of any stone in the broken wall he felt comparatively happy and safe; for he thought that, even if Lucile should miss her footing and slip, he could hold her up and raise her to the edge of the broken floor. At last she crouched on his left safely in the deep old window, and Churchill drew a long breath of relief, although they were now in the teeth of a fierce wind, that howled through the aperture which held but did not shelter them.

Tossing in her boat outside sat the bold Nanette. She had been rowing round the old fort, lying to as well as she could, after every considerable risk of having an oar broken by the fierce, chopping blows which the sudden waves dealt. When she saw the lovers on the window sea set her teeth hard and began to row cautiously toward them, while she talked to the angry waves, and argued with them and scolded them, as if they were naughty and mutinous young sisters.

"Or, chien! Will you again? Vo, donc, misérable! Strike again, will you then? That costs! That says be quick! Malaigne, you there. That blinds the eyes, though, and one can not see! For all that, I come round again! Softly, now, and gently! Ah, little pigs of waves! So, once more! Courage, beyond there! Voilà, Nanette, who comes to save the sweet demoiselle!"

Churchill had one arm round Lucile's waist, while with the other he held firmly to the window. He knew that if Nanette could succeed at a favorable moment in bringing the boat close up to the window, not a second must be lost. The little craft could not keep tossing and dashing there a minute of time without being crushed. So he watched, with eager, fierce eyes, for the one favoring instant when he could lift Lucile into the boat—and then it did not matter about him. He could return to the roof and wait there until the tide turned; and it would, indeed, be better so, for then no one could see him landing with Lucile; and so all talk and wonder and scandal would be avoided.

Now, Nanette! now, Churchill! The moment is coming; the boat draws cautiously near and near. Nanette is a brave oarswoman, and has the eye, the wrist, the nerves, of one who is at home on the sea, and to whom danger is only a stimulant and a quickener. With skill and care and courage she approaches, her teeth set hard, her eyes wide open. One instant more—alas! a wild, fierce gust rushes over the sea, "straight from the sunset," dashes the waves into a more wild and broken fury than had yet been seen, and smashes the boat again, again, and again, up to the rugged stones of the tower's wall. The waves and the stone seemed to crush, or rather to crunch, the poor little boat, as the jaws of Martin, the bear, might crunch a nut; and while Lucile gives a wild scream, and Churchill a deep, savage cry of disappointment and vexation, the boat goes down, and Nanette is seen vainly tossing and struggling in the water, and the next minute clinging, like a wild cat, to the ledge of the window. Then Churchill flings his arm round the dripping girl, and lowering himself so far out of the tower that the waves lashed him and almost blinded him, he dragged Nanette safely into the frame-work of the window.

"Tonnerre, this twice in a season, that!" was the first exclamation of the undaunted lass. "And the boat gone down! Up, Mademoiselle Lucile! up, monsieur! No time to lose! Must not stay here any longer or we shall have the sea for a lodger. The roof!"

Yes; there was no time to lose. The boat was gone, the sea was growing ever wilder and wilder; darkness was setting in. It was hopeless to think of any rescue until the sea should go down, and hour upon hours before the tide's ebb could bring them release. They hurried along the narrow ledge of floor again, the haste and excitement of the moment giving them no time to think even of Lucile's danger. They scampered, like mad school-boys, up the stairs, and when they got to the roof Nanette flung herself down and rolled about on the sea with pure power of delight. The whole thing was quite a wild, delicious adventure to this absurd girl, who now indulged, first, in a fit of wild laughter, and then in a hysterical fit, to relieve the exuberance of her mermaid spirits.

It must be owned that Churchill, too, had liked the adventure well enough so far. But he could not now doubtfully across the driving waters, and help Lucile's hand firmly in his own, as she clings to a loved being in some moment of supreme crisis.

Instead Nanette gave over her gleesome carnowonde and looked out over the water too. She became serious in a moment. She pushed back the hair which had fallen over her eyes, then cleared the eyes of the sea-spray which had gathered on them, and steadily studied the scene. Churchill read the expression with which she turned to him.

"The sea will rise high to-night," said the fisher-girl, "high, monsieur, over this tower. If no one sees us and the wind comes out—ah, well, c'est fini!"

"I know it," said Churchill.

"And I," exclaimed Lucile, passionately—"and I am not afraid! I am glad that we perish together!"

"Ah, yes, par exemple," murmured the poor fisher-girl. "but my lover, à moi, is yonder, away in the town!"

That evening M. Desterre sought wildly every where for his daughter. He thought that he ont after sunset was strange; and when the storm came on he was filled with almost frantic fear for her account. He ran about in the beach, and there heard the startling news that a plank of a boat known to belong to the fisher-girl, who was Lucille's special friend and protégée, had been flung ashore by the rising tide, and that the girl's lover was in despair about her. M. Desterre at once assumed that his daughter had gone out in the girl's boat, had been overtaken by the storm, and had perished. The wretched father's agony was intense, and it was imbittered by the knowledge that he had trampled on his daughter's love scheme. When things went well with M. Desterre he was a tremendous Voltairean; but now, in his prostrate misery, he collapsed into the most abject of devotees. There was on the beach, as has been already stated, a flaring shrine and hideous image of the Virgin. M. Desterre flung himself before it.

"Marie sanctissima!" he exclaimed; "give me back my daughter! Star of the Sea, save my Lucille. Send her to me once more, and—and—par Dieu" (and all the eloquence of the prayer broke down into a sob and ample anathema), "she shall marry my one she likes to-morrow!"

"Fiend of heaven," M. Desterre cried a cheery voice in his ear, and Frank Churchill, dripping, bruised, bleeding, with a wondering crowd after him, stood before the astonished father and held out a wet hand.

"M. Churchill! Where do you come from? Where is my daughter?"

"Your daughter! I will restore to you in twenty minutes, with the help of a stout boat and any two brave boys here. She is in the old fort with Nanette, the fisher-girl; but there is not a moment to lose, for the sea is almost level with the roof!"

Needless to say that the boat was manned and launched, and the two girls were rescued. There was, indeed, no time to lose. What had happened was simple. When Churchill saw that it was idle to think of attracting the attention of any one on the shore, he gave Nanette a quiet hint of his determination; and while she threw her arms round Lucile he flung himself into the sea. A wild shriek from the fort rang in his ears as he plunged into the dark, cold, angry water. He felt very confident of reaching the shore, for he was a stout swimmer, and the tide was rising fast. His great danger, indeed, was that he might be driven above too soon, and so dashed against part of the rocky promontory, on the extreme point of which stood the fort now so nearly submerged. But he kept out as well as he could until he was borne in front of the beach by the flowing waves; and then he allowed the waves to fling him ashore as they would, and they flung him almost at the feet of the Virgin's statue, and of M. Desterre, who prayed and vowed to her. The waters that night flowed high for the old town.

M. Desterre kept his word. His daughter was affianced to Frank Churchill the very next day. But Churchill, nevertheless, went out to fight in his country's great battle. He served all through the war, and returned none the worse, save for the marks of a wound or two, after the fall of Richmond. He is very happy with his French wife now, and they were in Washington only last year.

"We have to thank the Virgin for our happiness," said Lucille to him, piously, one day.

"The Virgin?" replied Frank. "Oh, yes, certainly—and also the old fort, and the rising tide!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A PARIS lady abruptly entered her kitchen the other day and saw the cook skimming the soup with a silver spoon. "Why, Jane!" she said, in surprise, "I certainly forbade you to use the silver in the kitchen." "But, ma'am, this spoon was dirty!"

A little boy in the infant class of a Sunday-school was asked by his teacher whether he had learned any thing of a book known to belong to the fisher-girl, who was Lucille's special friend and protégée, had been flung ashore by the rising tide, and that the girl's lover was in despair about her. M. Desterre at once assumed that his daughter had gone out in the girl's boat, had been overtaken by the storm, and had perished. "I sympathize sincerely with your grief," said a friend to a recently widowed friend. "It must be such a husband as yours—" "Ah, yes, he was very good; and then, you see, such a misfortune is always great, for one knows what kind of a husband she has got, but one can not tell what kind of a man one will find to succeed him."

TOBACCO.

ESSAY BY A SMALL BOY.

Tobacco grows somewhere else cabbages; but I never saw none of it boiled, although I have eaten boiled cabbage and vinegar on it, and I have heard men say that cigars that was grown to them on election day for nothing was cabbage leaves. Tobacco stores are somewhere kept by wooden Injuns, who stand at the door and they hold in their hands a cigar during the hours of business, which the right hand is Injun's hands and is made of wood also. Higgs did not like tobacco the first time he tried it. Tobacco was invented by a man named Walter Raleigh. When the people first saw him smoking they thought he was a steamboat, as they had never seen a steamboat, they were frightened. My father used to say, I don't know whether he likes tobacco or not. There is a young man named Leroy who comes to see her. I guess she likes Leroy. He was standing on the steps one night, and he had a cigar in his mouth, and he said he didn't know as he would like it, and she said, "Leroy, the portiere is open." Then he lighted his cigar immediately. My brother Tim smoked his cigar, and he said, "Get out of the house, you horrid creature, the smell of tobacco makes me sick." Would to Injun some other of my business. I took a little small once, and then I sneezed.

"I like to see the dear little creatures amusing themselves," said Mrs. Partington, as she looked over the visitor's new bonnet and affixed it to the tail of his kite. "Never fear," said the good natured boy to her relative, when she saw her bonnet in the air; "as soon as the kite comes down we will give it to you."

"Jennie," said a husband to her help the other morning, "Jennie, was there any fire in the kitchen last night when you went to bed?" "Why, sir," replied Jennie, with a look of injured dignity, "I always looked regularly at Bennie; but the innocent girl was not aware of her real business." Easy Learning.

Why should Bonnet not have cared for the month of June?—Because it was not July yet (duley).

A lady who is trying to cure her husband of smoking has resorted to music for his relief. She tells complains that "it is rather an expensive habit for two."

"Bob, is your sister at home?" "Yes; but she won't be, Bob, to-night." "Why? Now seem to be said she was going to have one more seem of onions and never go out another hour."

A lawyer of this city has conspicuously displayed in his office the following suggestive notification: "Gentlemen are requested to smoke cigars outside the office. Private sanctum."

Probably the notorious baron of Paris recently took hold of the common Dumas's button-hole and worried him with Monte Christo-dies about his last which challenged even more than the others the baron's credulity. "Is it possible?" said he. "Now seem to me astonished!" The dramatist replied: "Yes, but not by your story; what does astonish me is, that you should ever find cars to pour your story into so long as people have legs to run away from you."

Policeman, stare that dog, touch not a single hair; he worries many a boy from out his muddy hair. O, policeman was a pup, we know, but recently, he lapped his milk from a cup, when hungry, at a jump. And now he's grown to be so fierce in their place, he toil at eating bread upon our hands and feet, yes, you will surely let him be. O, policeman, have you no heart to be insensitive and prize for life—and lead. Go, put the muzzle now and put upon his mouth, and stop that bite, that wow, and tendency to growl, for in our children's pet, compassion of their joy; you will not find, O, policeman, and their hopes destroy. Go, put the muzzle now and put upon his mouth, and stop that bite, and

A COQUETTE'S ANSWER.

You tell me that my life is bound in fetters
Of folly, fashion, vanity, and pride:
That I have made my strongest taints abettors
In trampling my best virtues till they died;
That glitter for true gold my heart has chosen,
And dreamy it pays the certain cost—
The fountains of its sweetest impulse frozen,
The graces of its noblest longings lost!

You say that I have learned to value lightly
The happiness of human souls, and look
On pretence and deception flatly, rightly,
As pages of some long-familiar book.
You say that nature's gifts, in golden largess,
My acts and aims to barren use apply:
That never, unbarred, dwell upon your changes?
No word among their many I deny.

Yet, friend, it were more needless than denial
To wake the old and story once again—
Its memories of miserable trial—
The darkness and asperities of their pain!
The days when all grew desolate and cruel
That once I decked imperishably flower!
The days when I beheld hope's precious jewel
Roll reckless to the black bleak of despair!

You know, my friend, what divine completeness
Was the ambition of my woman's faith was blest;
You saw with what unutterable weariness
I bore the dreadful silence of my breast.
But, ah! the gorgeous dream-world is unwearying!
Have you forgotten, then? Would so might I!
As life had fed my fervor of believing,
And love had given obedience to its law!

Sharp agony—stern self-control—the seeming
To move in some strange pressed vagueness far
From that all-cherished part, an icy dreaming,
And view my fellow-mortals as they are!
Such disenchantment followed. How I pardoned
The scoffing world that wrought it for me! No.
Inhibited, haughty, skeptical, and hardened,
I deal—and without mercy—blow for blow!

CHAPTER V.

AT CROMPTON.

After the bold avowal made at the conclusion of the last chapter, Richard Yorke and his father (for such indeed he was) stood confronting one another, for more a minute, without a word. The tempest of evil passions swept over Caren's swarthy face, and his eyes flashed with a fire that seemed to threaten personal violence. The bull-dog, too, as though perceiving his master's irritation with displeasure, began to growl again; and this, perhaps, was fortunate for the young man, as affording a channel for the Squire's pent-up wrath. With a great oath, leveled alike at man and brute, he raised his foot, and kicked the latter to the other side of the room.

"Impudent bastard!" cried he; "how dare you show your face beneath my roof?"

"How dare I?" responded the young man, excitedly, and with his handsome face aglow, "Because there was naught to fear at home by day were, I should not have feared it."

"I'll, by—! I wish a game could never have entered into your young head. Your mother must have set you on to do it—come, Sir, the truth, this time."

"She did not set me on, father," insisted the other, earnestly. "I came here of my own will. I have been dwelling within a stone's throw of your house these six months, in hopes to see you face to face. She told me not to come—I even she did."

"So much the better for her," ejaculated the Squire, grimly. "If I thought that she had any hand in this, not another shilling of my money should she ever receive. It was apparent between us," he continued, passionately—"and I, for my part, am a man who knows his own mind—that she and hers should never meddle more with me and mine; and now she has broken faith."

"Nay, Sir, but she has not," returned the young man, firmly. "I tell you it was against her will that I came hither."

"The devil it was!" exclaimed the Squire, suddenly bursting into a wild laugh. "If you got your way or her, when she was against 'em, you must be a rare one. You are my son for certain, however, or you would never dare to stand here. It was a rash step, young Sir, and it might have ended in the horse-pond. I had half a mind to set my bull-dog at you. Since you are here, however, you can stay. But let us understand one another. I am your father, in a sense, and I am father, for aught I know, to half the parish; but as to being lawfully so, the law has happened to have decided otherwise. I tell you frankly, you would say about 'the rights of it;' but that's beside the question: the law, I say, for once, is on my side. And I stand by it. You shall have good reason to do so; and if your mother had been your wife, as she was not, you would be with me so far. Now, look you," and here again the speaker's manner changed with his shifting mood, "if you come again you venture to enter the house by your father, or to boast of me as such, I will have you turned out neck and crop. And as for Richard Yorke, my guest, you will be welcome at Crompton, so long as we two suit each other; only beware, young Sir, that you keep your place. I shall soon get rid of you on these terms," continued the Squire, with a chuckle; "for to speak truth must be as difficult to you, considering the stock you come of, as dancing on the tight-rope. Your mother, indeed, was a first-rate rope-dancer in that way, and I rarely caught her tripping; but you—"

"Sir," interrupted the young man, passionately, "is this your hospitality?"

"Hospitality!" sneered the Squire, good-humoredly; "I had intended to have forgotten Madam Yorke's existence. Well, Sir, what are you?—what do you do, I mean, for a livelihood —beside 'night-watching?'"

"I am a landscape-painter, Sir."

"Umph!" grunted Caren, contemptuously; "you don't get flat on that pasture, I reckon. Have you never done any thing else?"

For a single instant the young man hesitated to reply; then answered, firmly—

"You are quite sure of that?" inquired the other, suspiciously.

"Quite sure."

"Good! Here, come with me."

His host led the way into the main corridor, hung with tall pictures of their common ancestors, and opened the door of another apartment. It was of a vast size; and even when the Squire had lit the candles upon the mantle-piece, and those which chandeliers of ormolu of the great pier-glass, the darkness did but give place to a sort of gloomy twilight. The effect of this strange effect was the peculiarity of the furniture: the walls were of bog-oak, relieved, like those of the corridor, by silver-wrought chairs were of the same material. The curiosity of the room was, however, a sideboard, of the same dark metal size, and adorned above with ostrich feathers, which gave it the appearance of a fairy vessel cur; it was more of solid sheety as were also the carved head and foot boards; it was hung with the same quaint contrivance, and was draped and piled upon its coverlet of purple silk by a quit of Brussels point lace of exquisite design.

"I will have your traps brought in here," said Caren, throwing open the end of his cigar, and drawing from his pocket a heap of fibrets; "it will be more convenient. You will find a room through yonder door, where you can wash and point to your heart's content."

"You lodge me to splendidly, Sir, that I shall feel like Christopher Sly," observed the young fellow, gratefully.

"Ay, ay enough, I'll warrant," returned the Squire, who had just cracked a nut and found it a bad one. "That's Bred in the Bone with you, I reckon," took yonder!" As he spoke, a peculiar sour cloud upon the chimney-piece struck the half-hour, and a gilt-gorgeous clock on a pedestal, showing its fang, which was set in brilliants. "That's my forgent clock, which always reminds me of Madam, your mother, and more so, because it goes for a twelvemonth, which was just the time she and I lived in double harness. But here are your clothes, and you must be quick in getting into them, for we dine at any rate, within the hour. Now, my son and heir," and him fetch a red coat for this gentleman.—"you have the pedigree, Mr. Yorke, and before dinner is served." And with a careless nod to his guest, and a whistle to his four-footed companion, the Squire walked off.

The young man would have given much to even had he been sure of his position; but there was the events of the last few minutes, and to reflect upon his present position; but there was no time to do so. He had not the moral courage to his host by being late. He therefore and, but before the end of half an hour from his a mere exhibition of magnificence, the design was had failed; it was only Yorke's self-esteem that had been compromised; the fact was that the young fellow was of that character on whom superiority of any sort had its effect; while in the present case the signs of wealth about him gave him self-confidence, rather than any feeling of inferiority. He was not even ashamed to show himself "by rights," as the Squire had said, the best of all his sons; and by no means displeased of becoming so, not only de jure, but de facto. Certainly, as he now regarded himself in the glass, he had but little cause to do so; and as he considered at the he reflected complacently that, so far as personal appearance went, he was not likely to find a superior in any of the company he was about to meet. A handsomer young fellow than himself could scarcely be found among some moss of the Crompton gong.

He had no difficulty in finding his way to the drawing-room, for a stream of red-coated guests was already setting thither from their respective apartments, and was easily to them unannounced. This was the only apartment in the house which did not bear evidence of modern improvement, because, as on the present occasion, it was used for exactly five minutes every evening, and at no other time. Throughout the year, under the Squire's guests invariably adjourned to the billiard-table or the library, and the former of these rooms was left alone in its magnificence. This neglected apartment had probably existed since the days of the Cromptons, for each of the Crompton, although there were drawing-rooms galore there, as well as one or two such exquisite boudoirs as might have been expected from her consort. It was a burning shame, said the matrons of the district, that Caren did not make use of the county should not have a lawful mistress to grace it; and it was not their fault on has been denied that deficiency had not been supplied. It was really a splendid room, not divided any way, but long and lofty, and of vast extent, but comprehending every description of architectural vagary—bay-windows, in each of which half a dozen persons might sit and move, and recesses where as many could ensconce themselves, without their presence being dreamed of by the occupants of the central space.

At present, however, the flood of light that poured from chandelier and bracket, and flashed upon the gorgeous furniture and on the red coats of the guests, seemed to forbid concealment, and certainly afforded a splendid spectacle—a diplomatic reception, or a fancy-ball, could for brilliancy scarcely have exceeded it, though the parallel went no farther; for, with all this pomp and circumstance, there was not the slightest trace of ceremony. New guests, like Yorke himself, flocked in, and stood and stared, or paraded the room; while the less recent arrivals laughed and chatted together noisily, with their backs to the fire—of which there were no less than three alight—or lolled at full length upon the damask sofas. These groups were but, upon the whole, of an aristocratic type; many of them, indeed, were of good birth, and all had taken the usual pains with their costume, but a life of dissipation had set its vulgarizing mark on them: on the features the glass and the haunted look of the rose was indeed rarely seen—country air and rough exercise had forbidden that—but drain and the living had written their autographs upon them in another and worse handwriting. Blotches and pimples had usurped the place of that original likeness to gentlemen that is was even whispered by the scandalous that it was to prevent the contact with this resemblance, that must needs have otherwise arisen, that the Squire of Crompton compelled his sons to wear red coats. The habitues of the place, who were the contemporaries of the Squire, had, as it were, gone to seed, and had not the sprinkling of a better class, or, at all events, of a class that had not as yet sunk so low as they in the scale of debauchery: a young lord or two in their minority, whom their parents or guardians could not coerce into keeping better company, and other young gentlemen of fashion, in whose eyes Caren was "A devilish good fellow," and "Quite a character, by Jove!" and "A sort of man to know."

Among these last was Mr. Frederick Chandos, who had an eye-glass in one of his expressive mums with his gig-wheels, and Mr. Theodore Clare, who had been at Eton with Lord Mayo, and who had been at Oxford with Lord Mayo, and who had been at Cambridge with Lord Mayo. His Falstaff to the Squire's Prince Hal was a rotund and portly man, like his host, and somewhat florid and portly man, like his host, and somewhat florid in complexion. His smile was winning yet cool, in spite of his load of years and fat, he still considered himself a match for any lad to the fair sex.

For this information and much more, respecting the character of his fellow-guests, who were inducted to a knowledge of their patronage, who had introduced himself to him as "Parson Whyte, Sir," and whom he knew to be the Squire's chaplain. The reverend divine was as proud of that office (and infinitely more comfortable in it) as though he had been bishop to an archbishop. He was the only man present who wore a black coat, and he was conscious of a certain priestly manner, which really did smack something of the pulpit.

"Mr. Yorke," said he, blandly, "I make no apology for introducing myself to you; Caren has told me all. Having a talk about your art, and he has no secrets from his ghostly adviser. I take your hand with pleasure. I seem to feel it is the first time I ever shook hands with Poet or no, but I am, be sure, no effort of mine to be wanting to let you make a consummation."

Yorke flushed with pleasure, not at the honest terms, but that the parson will they evidently, for at the news itself—the fact of his father having revealed their relationship to him seemed so full of goodness—that he resented the man's professions, the audacity of which seemed certainly to imply that he had taken for a fool.

"I am sure, Mr. Whymper," said he, stiffly, "I ought to be greatly obliged to you."

"Hush! not Mr. Whymper, if you please, for that's a fine here. Every body at Crompton calls me 'Parson Whyte,' Sir. Not at all, we're only natural that, being what I am, I should wish you well. The law, it is true, has decided against your mother's claim, but the Church is bound to think otherwise. In my eyes you are the Squire's only son and heir, he made a whispering-gallery of his brawny hands, and added with great significance—"and heir."

"I see," said Yorke, smiling in spite of himself.

"Of course you do; and you think I was trifling with your intelligence? I tell you that it is quite on the cards that you may recover your own estate, and not lose even the money your own again. Caren is delighted with you, not so much because you saved his stags as because you are his son, and legal battle with him by the Decoy Pond. He has been consulting me professionally as to whether it would be expedient to the tables of affinity to have another set-to with you. I am sorry my reply was in the negative, but I fear it was so. I do believe you would have thrushed him; but I was so afraid of his getting the better of you, which might have ruined your fortunes."

Richard could only repeat his thanks for the kind sympathy expressed for him. "Your body here, I suppose," observed the latter, "and, with a few exceptions, which I will name to you, we all going to-morrow except Ryan Kyll. That's old Ryan yonder, with the whiskers, and his hands behind him; he has nowhere else to put them, poor fellow." And here Parson Whymper launched into biography as aforesaid.

The clock on the chimney-piece, on which the two were leaning, broke in upon the divine's scarcely less dulcet accents with its silver quarter.

"This is the first time," said Whymper, "that I have ever known your father late; and to you belongs the honor of having caused him to transgress his own immutable rule."

His wife was speaking a hunting-horn was blown in the hall beneath, and the whole company turned en masse, like a field of poppies before a sudden wind, to the door where Caren was standing.

CHAPTER VI.

THE FEAST OF LAPITHÆ.

That host himself led the way down stairs, while the rear of the party was brought up by Mr. Whymper, to whom Yorke attached himself.

When they reached the dining-room, and before they took their seats at the ample table, the chaplain, with sonorous voice, gave a view holla! which was the Crompton grace.

"It is very distressing to me to have to act in this way," whispered he to his young friend, whose countenance betrayed considerable astonishment: "but it is the custom of the house; and, after all, there is no harm in it. Ut nisimis non curat lex, you know."

"That does not hold good with respect to the law of affinities, parson," answered Mr. Bryan Ryll, who sat on the other side of him, "if, at least, I have not forgotten my Ovid."

"I always understood that Burns had very loose views upon such matters," returned the chaplain, demurely.

"My dear parson, your remark is like that excellent gentleman which I wish I could see at this critical well-provided table—cavaier to the multitude. Why is it not furnished? You have only to say the word." Here he addressed him self to Yorke: "This worthy divine who sits at the bottom of the table, young gentleman, and who has appointed his duty in not having introduced us, is all-powerful here; and we all endeavor to make friends of him; but in the circumstance, it is whispered, the only respect in which he resembles the mammon of unrighteousness."

A shadow of annoyance crossed the parson's smiling face.

"Mr. Richard Yorke," said he, "this is Mr. Bryan Ryll, our unlicensed jester."

"Not unlicensed, on the contrary," retorted the other, with twinkling eyes, "is our Vice, and gives himself every license. What is the matter with Caren to-night? He looks glum. I dare say he has been eating greens and bacon for his dinner, because, and is now regretting the circumstance. He has no moral courage, poor fellow, and knows not how to deny his appetites.

"You never did such a wasteful thing in your life, Parson Whyte," said the host, smiling; "and yet some say that you have been a profligate."

"Know it," replied the gourmand, shaking his head; "and I forgive them. They call me a glutton, and I don't quarrel: if it be so, I have ever a master of some capacity, which is not the case with every body."

"I am hearing something about me, you big fat man," cried Caren, from the other end of the table, and he must have had a very unpleasant grasp in it. "Come, out with it!"

"If our venerable friend does not stoop to deception," answered the reverend Mr. Whyte's ear, "he will now find himself in an ugly hole."

"I was observing that you did not like your lampreys, Squire," said the stout gentleman, "and remarked that you were in no want of a fish."

"What's a feeder!" returned the host, ill-humoredly; "there's a fish, you'll own, not one yourself, for, egad, you're getting near your second childhood!"

"I must have been my plumpness and innocence which suggested that idea," responded the other, smiling. "But if you have not got a feeder, or will you have missed a great advantage, Squire. When you dine with my Lord Mayor on Monday, as always asked, Will you have a feeder, or will you not? If you say 'Yes,' you pay your half-guinea, and get him. But if you say 'No,' you get a guinea's worth for myself, and much resembles a beneficed clergyman. He annually inducted into his benefice the fossil, and delicately suggests what it is best for you to eat, to drink, and to avoid. 'No; no salmon,' he murmurs, 'if you have had turbot yesterday;' and, 'Now, a glass of Burgundy, if you please, Sir;' or, 'Now, a glass of sherry.' If an indigestible or ill-compounded entrée is handed, he will whisper: 'No, Sir; neither now nor never,' with quite the authority of a eminent indigestible, and he will suffer you to take Gruyere cheese, nor port with it. Sixteen. The consequence is, that the next morning feel as lively as though you had not feasted on the previous evening, and convinced what you make a good investment of your half-guinea in securing his services. If there was a feeder at Crompton," concluded the gluttonous parson, sighing, and with a hypocritical look, "it would be a boon to some of you young fellows, who might possess a healthy and devout age."

"That's a good one!" "Well done, Hyam!" "Yes you have it, Whyte!" exclaimed the guests, for such were the terms in which the gallery at Crompton expressed their approbation, whether of wit or of the beast; but Mr. Frederick Chandos and a few others, inclusive of Mr. Theodore Fane, kept a dignified silence, as over a thing that was beyond their capacities—they reserved their high approval for "gentlemen's stories" only. Even the gallery, the grim Sir whom alone the narrative had been served and garnished, sat so very quiet a moment, that Caren upon it, that "when he had used up old Ryan's brains he should now have the less scruple in turning him out-of-doors, inasmuch as it seemed there was a profession in town that was just suited to him."

How wondrous is the power of naked wealth—of the mere money! Simply because he had a large rent-roll, and that Caren could find not only companions of his own calibre—reckless good-for-naughts, or dull debauchees—but could command grayheard experience, wit, the art of pleasing, in one man; and in another, all that was not less destitutive of, and needed more, politic management and common-sense. We do not say, as the Squire himself sometimes did, when in a good-humour with his two satellites, that Parson Whymper and Byam Rydl had more brains in their little fingers than all his other friends had in their whole bodies, but it was certain that, even when drunk, they were wiser than the others when sober: the one had acuteness enough for a great statesman (or what has been so such in England) to hold the most discordent elements together, and to make what is now seem almost sound; and, indeed, without his chaplain's dexterous skidding, Carew would long ago have irretrievably lost social caste, and dissipated his vast means to the last shilling. On the other hand, Byam Rydl was gifted with manner qualities; he was essentially a man of mark and character, and might have made his fortune in any pursuit by his own wits: had he not early had been ready-made when he came of age, and he had accepted himself very agreeably instead in getting through it, in which he had quite succeeded. Parson Whymper, who had never known what it was to have a ten-pound note to call his own, was now no worse off than he. They would both have frankly owned, had they been asked, that they detested work of any kind. Yet the chaplain had almost as much business on his hands as the lawyer of a great nobleman. The administration of Carew's affairs, besides filling an office which was by no means a sinecure, in that of its master of the ceremonies, from the rudeness in that house would have been bitterly avenged, and many a quarrel would have had a serious termination, but for the good offices of Parson Whymper. Nor would Mr. Byam Rydl have been considered by every lady to have an easy livelihood in making jests out of every occasion, to tickle the fancy of a dull general audience and of a patron, as often as not, morose: yet the flesh-pots of Egypt had attracted both these to the Squire's table, and to the property as well as their will conenting; and in exchange for meat and drink, with which at the best, they had sold themselves into slavery. Upon the whole, they were well disposed to one another: the kind of intelligence they used against the rich "roughs" with whom they had to deal; they fitted together, side by side, against the canaille; yet each, from the better consciousness of his own degradation, took pleasure in the humiliation or discomfiture of the other, at the rude hands of their common master.

"Profession," said Chandos, in reply to Carew's last remark, "is a good, your profession is lucky to have found one in these days. They will be the only young gentlemen who will be living without answering questions, writing down things, drawing wages, and passing. What the deuce do they call them?"

"Hanged if I know," said the Squire. "Ask Byam; he knows every thing."

"I beg Mr. Byam," drawled the young man, somewhat insolently, but without being aware that he was addressing a lawyer, "to tell me, Captain name, 'Carew says you know every thing. What is it that a gentleman is now obliged to go through before he can get any of those sort of things one used to get for the asking? What is the confounded thing one has to pass?"

"Master," answered Rydl, derisively, as though it was a riddle.

Carew laughed aloud. The nearer a retort approached to a practical joke, provided it was not at his own expense, the better he liked it.

"What did the old beggar say?" inquired Mr. Frederick Chandos, his fair face crimson with anger.

"He asked for the mustard; he didn't hear you," answered the Squire, mischievously; "he never does hear a fellow who lisps.

"I asked you, Mr. Byam," repeated the young man with dignity, "what it is that one has to pass those examinations?"

"The name of the gentleman on my left, Mr. Chandos," said Rydl, and not Byam—except to his intimate friends," interposed the chaplain; "and the name you are in want of is examination."

"That's it," said the young man, slapping the table, and forgetting both his mistake and his anger in the consciousness of ridiculing the solicitor. "Competitive examination is what they call it. Well, you know, there was my young brother to confound him!—looking to me to pay his bills and, in fact, having nothing to live upon, poor devil, except what I give him. So, of course, I was anxious to get him off my hands."

"Very natural," assented Carew. "For my part, I could never see what younger brothers were born for."

"You! you see it less if you had one to keep," continued Chandos. "In old times, now, I could have got a few scratching words out of some old governor, or in the colonies; and so I should now, but for one thing—that he had to pass one of these cursed examinations first. Of course, as it had to be done, and as Jack, according to his own account, was as much out of form for one as another of them, I recommended him to try his luck for something in India; for as long as you can keep a fellow on the other side of the world he can't bow you—not to hurt; it sin't like cutting a fellow!—and you need never read his letters unless you like. Well, India's in, 'says Jack; 'that's as good a place as any other;' though, in my opinion, he never expected to go there. He thought he had no chance whatever of pulling through, and so did I, for the fact is, Jack is a born fool."

"Did you say he was your brother, or only your half-brother?" inquired Mr. Byam Rydl with an appearance of great interest.

"My very own brother, Sir," replied the unconscious Chandos, flattered to find such attention paid to him; "and as like to me as one thimble, I mean as one pea, is to another. Well, the strange thing is, the dence alone knows how it happened, but Jack got through." Here he took a bumper of port, as though in honor of that expression. "In a perfect marvel, but the best thing for him (as well as for me) in the world. Nobody ever went out under better auspices, for the governor at Madras is one of mine and Jack was to school with his private sec.: it's a first-rate connection. Our family has been connected with India for ever so long. I'll tell you how."

"It is a most admirable connection," observed Mr. Byam Rydl; "and the whole circumstances of the case will, I have no doubt, be interesting in the highest degree to the new Lord Bengal. Your brother should embody them in a neat speech, and deliver it from the deck of the steamer before he lands."

It is probable that Mr. Frederick Chandos would have no further opportunities of this observation as to have accepted it as a compliment had not Carew given utterance to a wild laughs, which brotReead high approval, and was one of his few tokens of enjoyment. He had received unmistakable proofs of weariness and boredom before his intellectual henchman had been struck to his latsalf, or was even really gratified for the rescue. Chandos was mustering some drunken words of insolence and anger; but Carew bore of no reply.

"Pooh, pooh! Old Byam was right!" cried he, with boisterous mirth. "I dare say all that long story of yours may interest the public by-and-by; but for me, I care nothing about it. It's all rubbish. Be quiet, Byam, and don't let's to0 early yet for buffets. Here, bring the beaker."

This was a magnificent tankard, the pride of Crompton, which, at the conclusion of dinner, was always filled with claret, and was then passed round the table. It was lined with silver gilt, but made of ivory, and had a cover of the same, richly finely carved. On the top was represented a Forest Scene, with Satyrs pursuing Nymphs; on the lid was the Bacchic Triumph, while the stem was formed by a sculptured figure of Hercules. If the artist, Magnus Berg, who had fashioned it long ago at Rome, for the Duke, had had foresight of the sort of company into whose hands his work was in these days to pass he could not have left it in a more fit condition. His Satyrs and his Centaurs had here their representatives in the flesh; while the tense uneasiness of the son of Alcmena had their counterpart in those of the man who now stood up at the head of that splendid table, and poured out a draught as though the port were porter. It was a feat to hold it even when empty, but Carew drew did so; but to empty it at a draught was, even for him, an impossibility, for it held three bottles of wine. Byam Rydl was known to be acquitted of entertaining reverence for any thing human or divine, and with the same equanimities regard for his beaker, and believed that so long as he held it his possession—like the "Luck of Eden Hall"—it would never be taken from him. He attached all the importance of a religious ceremony—and, indeed, to him it was one—to the precise moment when the liquor should be practical—to the using of this goblet, and on every conceivable occasion. The stage was, that one held the beaker in his left hand, and drank with his right, after a ceremonious bow to him: and it fell to the lot of the clerical Chandos to perform this latter duty immediately after dinner, and when there was still much wine in the goblet. Carew rose as to his footing, and, having sight of its elevation, as well as with the weight of his burden, he hesitated to drink. Perhaps, in his already overwhelmed brain, he had some notion of first passing the vessel on, and thereby showing his magnanimity. Such a thought, however, would have been unfortunate for him, for, with a fierce ejaculation of impatience, Carew crammed the great lid on the young man's head, and, lifting the huge helmet of Ormaita, came down over nose and chin. Blackened with the contents of the goblet, and the contents of the goblet into what he thought was the Squire's face, but which was indeed the private face of his own wounded minister, Chandos rose and then began a scene that Smollett alone could have described with fitting vigour. Carew, as he was unfortunate for him

PRINCE LEOPOLD OF HOHENZOLLERN.

LEOPOLD OF HOHENZOLLERN.

PRINCE LEOPOLD of Hohenzollern, whose candidature for the Spanish throne was so eagerly made the pretext for war by the Emperor of France, is a quiet, reserved, and rather studious man of thirty-five, with a disposition quite the reverse of bellicose. Possessed of great wealth, and taking no part in military or political affairs, he lives the pleasant life of a gentleman of leisure, and probably nothing but his bigoted attachment to the Roman Catholic faith, which may require a firm hand to support it in Spain, induced him to listen to the overtures of General PRIM.

The HOHENZOLLERNS, to whom the reigning family of Prussia belongs, date back to the beginning of the ninth century. Its most ancient progenitor mentioned in history is Count THASSILO, whose romantic story is narrated in CARLYLE'S history of "Frederick the Great." The territory, which since 1849 has formed an administrative division of Prussia, derives its name from a fine old castle, situated on the very summit of a mountain near Hechingen. It lies between Wurtemberg and Baden, and contains an area of about 400 square miles, and 60,000 inhabitants. The castle, as well as its situation, as may be seen from our engraving, is exceedingly picturesque. The region it overlooks is one of the most beautiful in all Germany. The mountains, though not attaining any thing like Alpine grandeur, present a charmingly picturesque variety, and every locality has its poetic legend and its association with the old heroic age of Germany. We fancy that Prince LEOPOLD could ill afford to exchange this peaceful retreat for the vain honors of a crown.

MOVING TO THE FRONT.

IT is reported that LOUIS NAPOLEON counted upon disaffection in South Germany as a strong element in his projected promenade across the Rhine, and that the delay in the movement was caused by the unwelcome discovery that he had reckoned without his host, and that the disaffection was confined to a few princes whose importance had been lessened by the overshadowing greatness of Prussia. The mass of the people were found to be true to their old dream of German unity, and as soon as the news of the declaration of war against Prussia was published in Germany an uprising of the people took place very similar to what was witnessed in this country immediately after the firing on Fort Sumter. Throughout all the northern and southern states alike, the greatest enthusiasm was manifested. Every government responded readily to the call for troops, and at once placed its forces at the disposal of Prussia. From every part of the country they were rapidly transferred to the front, and before NAPOLEON was ready for his dash across the Rhine he found himself in the face of an army equal to his own in numbers, and animated by a far higher enthusiasm. His great opportunity was lost.

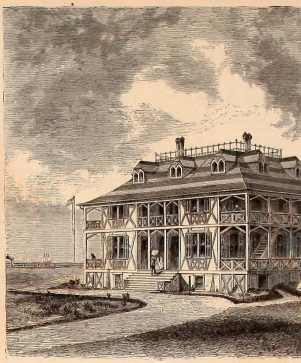
THE PRESIDENT'S COTTAGE AT LONG BRANCH.

THE cottage purchased by President GRANT at Long Branch, where he has retired for a brief interval of much-needed repose from the responsible duties of public life, is, as may be seen by our illustration, a very tasteful and elegant bit of summer architecture. It stands directly on the Bluff, some distance beyond the most western of the long line of hotels, and commands a fine view of the ocean on one side, and of the village and landscape on the other. The side of the cottage shown in our illustration fronts the road, from which a winding drive-in leads up to the door. The appearance of the grounds is somewhat barren and dreary; but this is a disadvantage in which all the cottages on the Bluff share alike, as the strong sea-breeze renders abortive every attempt at landscape-gardening. Neither tree nor shrub will flourish there; and the utmost that can be done is to cultivate a lawn. Turf, fortunately, appears to flourish; and, with a proper amount of culture, a fine, smooth, velvet lawn can be secured, which lovers of croquet can appreciate. Most of the cottages along the Bluff are thus surrounded, and the wide piazzas, in many cases extending on every side of the building, supply the place of natural shade.



PRESIDENT GRANT'S COTTAGE AT LONG BRANCH.—[PHOT. BY E. W. PAGE.]

THE FISHERMAN'S DAUGHTER.

THIS pretty and attractive sea-coast picture, engraved from an admirable water-color drawing by Mr. J. D. WATSON, a popular English artist, represents a scene at Cullercoats, a favorite bathing resort on the English coast. A little fisher-girl, barefooted, and with a mass of tangled hair falling over her forehead, is dragging a huge fish, almost as big as herself, by the gills, and looking down upon it with evident complacency. It is low tide, and the stretch of sand is broken by protruding rocks, among which lie still, bright pools of water; in the back-ground one long breaker stretches across the picture beneath a sweep of cloudy sky, a gleam of light on the left being reflected in the quiet pools. But is it not almost saddening to reflect how much prettier and more picturesque such a subject is in a painting, from a master's hand, than such a scene in real life would be?

THE LAST SMILE.

We have all seen in print, and most of us perhaps on real living lips and faces, what is called a sardonic smile. Not all of us may be aware of the alleged origin of that expression. The sardonic laugh of the ancients was an involuntary distortion of the muscles of the mouth, occasioned by a poisonous plant grown in Sardinia; and persons who died of this poison had a smile on their countenances—whence came about the meaning of a forced, or affected, and grimacing smile.

To a mere muscular mechanical movement is referred, by physiologists, the smile, so sweetly the reverse of sardonic, which is to be observed so often on the faces of the dying and of the dead. But under the spell of that suggestive aspect, one is inclined to scout a physiological reduction of it to its lowest terms, in the style of Horatio's objection to a certain post-mortem examination on the part of the Prince of Denmark, that "twere to consider too curiously to consider so." Edgar Poe adverts somewhere to what he calls "that suspiciously lingering smile upon the lip which is so terrible in death."

Chateaubriand claims, at the time of the exhumations of 1815, to have at once recognized the head of the Queen, "by the smile which this head had directed toward me at Versailles," and which imagination, or some correlative force, so conjuncently but so unmistakably saw there still. Beattie's letter, announcing the death of Lord Lyttleton, records a "fixed smile on his lifeless countenance." When the amiable doctor, some twenty years later, had to record the death of his own promising son, he was careful not to omit in his instance the like record of a settled smile. Of Geoffrey St. Hilaire it was that Edgar Quinet wrote, "Il approche, en souriant, de la vérité sans voile"—and this was literally true in articulo mortis. "Surely the angels had strolled him," said one of the children of that venerable Jameson of Methven who, renowned for a life-long smile, was found dead one morning on the hearth-rug—"the smile shining all radiant on his face," as having defied and survived death. Wordsworth devoutly commemorates in a sonnet the "heaven-revealing smile" on the face of the "dear sister, become Death's bride," he lost in 1836. To him that vision sanctified the sway of Death.

Father Eustace, in Scott's "Monastery," is described gazing on the pallid corpse of the Lady of Avenel, "from which the spirit had parted so placidly as to leave a smile upon the thin blue lips"—lips so long wasted by decay as to have parted with the last breath of animation without the slightest convulsive tremor.

Nicholas Nickleby, watching poor Smike in the slumber that preceded a deeper slumber that knows no waking, saw the closed eyes open, and a placid smile come on the pale face; for the dying boy's dreams had been tranquillizing, even joyous. Soon the slumberer slumbered again, and again smiled—died smiling.

The bereaved mother in MRS. Gaskell's "Tale of Manchester Life," who can not realize her bereavement, would fain persuade herself that her murdered Harry is pretending to be asleep—"Harry is so full of fun"—and playfully defying them all to waken him. "Look! he is smiling now; he hears I have found him out. Look!" And, in truth, the lips, in the rest of death, did look (we read) as though they were a smile; and the waving light of the unsmiled candle almost made them seem to move. In the same writer's pathetic story of "Ailie," the daughter pauses at the look of the dead woman's "beautiful, calm, still face, on which the last rapturous smile still lingered, giving the youthful look of bright serenity."

Lord Lytton's closing page of the "New Phædo" details the last moments of the dying philosopher. And here is the last of all: "I heard a slight sigh, and knew he was awake. I bent over to look into his face. The light from the window came full upon it, and I was struck—appalled, by the surpassing beauty of the smile that rested on the lips. But those lips had fallen from each other." For the life was departed; but the smile remained. So in "Harold" we have the hero gazing intently, lamp in hand, on the countenance of the father that he just lost: "That strange smile of the dead, common alike to innocent and guilty, had already settled on the serene lips;" and the old man seemed sleeping in his prime. In a later fiction from the same pen we have the old man whom life has been smileless, dying with a smile. In yet another we have the lady dying in pain—shrieking, and without a groan; and Leonard closes tenderly the heavy lids; and, as he covers the face, the lips smile a moment farewell. And of the Susan Mainwaring of the same author we read that she "lingered days and days" more, and then, for the first time since William's death, she smiled—that smile remained on the face of the corpse. In "Ernest" your eyes rest on Mr. Sherwin; in Mr. Wilkie Collins's "Basil," when the servant drew the curtain aside that night, the mistress still slept, and saw that her eyes were closed, and that "a lovely, happy smile, such as had never once been seen on that face for both years and years, was visible on it now."

The late Caroline Lucas Lytton of "Wuthering Heights" is pictured with smooth brow, her lids closed, her lips wearing the expression of a smile—"almost a smile of recovery—of the last thoughts to pleasant early days. Isabel, the Doctor's Wife, has a sense of any pretense when she tells that her husband is dead than Charles Raymond's significant assurance, "I never saw such a smile upon a human face as I see there now on his." The best glimpse M. Edmond About allows us of Colette is when the dying face resembles to analyze, for the last time, that flower of virtue and beauty: "Her face was calm and smiling; . . . it had effaced all the ravages of disease: Tulla was again, for one day, the prettiest girl of Rome." Like Elaine, in the "Idylls of the King,"

> Was lovely, for she did rest on it still,
> But fast asleep, and lay as tho' she smiled."

Or, like Edith, found by Arvingus within the cave,

> "——stark, as you see:
> Thus smiling, as some fair battle-field slumber,
> Not as death's dust, being fought of."

SUCCESSFUL ORATORY.

THERE is one essential condition of successful oratory, which we are rather apt to overlook in discussing the causes of its rarity, and which, nevertheless, has something to do with its question. That condition is simply that the speaker should believe in what he says. All the supposed methods of teaching elocution and securing a correct style may be very excellent in their way; and nobody can say that we do not feel the want which they recognize. It is painful to see men try to perform on the elocutionary pianos, all instruments, their own voices, without trying to understand the methods of rendering them effective. But such methods are not enough, because the greatest successes have been attained without them. Every public speaker who is skillful as Garrick or Lord Chatham in the management of voice and gesture, speaches might still be a weariness to the flesh; and we have all was as clumsy as the poor clergyman stuttering through his first sermon, this century ought to be as moving as the clumsy pleading for his life of an innocent man. If speeches are generally dull, we must ask how they are manufactured—whether they are likely to be the utterance of genuine conviction, or an attempt of the orator's ego to swagger themselves into a conviction.

What are the speeches which really rex our souls, and make us denounce the wrong or be rhetoric as an imposition and a bore? These is the kind of speech which may be expected to produce among eggs, where the performer is naturally anxious not so much to be graceful or vigorous, as to keep clear of producing a general smash. We admire the dexterity of his manœuvres; we smile as we see him approaching some plump down upon some forbidden conclusion, and yet by one dextrous twist at the last moment put ourselves himself from the threatening inevitable catastrophe. He advances and retreats, and winds in and out, and puts on a bold countenance on his dangers, that we are half-persuaded, for the time, that the movements are spontaneous and natural, and that he is not keeping an eye all the time upon the dangerous topics which it is his real object to avoid. Everyone as the feat may be, and completely as it may sometimes take in the initiated, even the uninitiated are dimly conscious of a certain constraint in the performer, which prevents them from catching the desired contagion. No man can speak really well who is not speaking freely, and who is haunted throughout by the dread that his genuine feelings may slip out at some temporary relaxation of his care. Equally painful is that variety of speech which is so often made by an official personage, who has to defend some grievance which, in the days of his independence, he had been the first to attack. Nobody has yet invented a mode of throwing dust in his own eyes and those of his hearers, so as to excite genuine enthusiasm. Or, again, it may be observed that political converts have generally very poor success as orators. Sunday morning. June the 18th, 1815; his father held him by the hand, and the two were walking to Hythe Church in Kent. To their surprise they found the congregation standing outside the church door, although it was not cool, and service was commencing within. They were anxiously listening to the first reverberations of the cannon which came from the east. It became afterward known that the clock of the church of Nivelles struck eleven at the moment when fired from the French centre at Waterloo on that day; and it was a fair inference that the sound of Hythe proceeded from those guns, although the distance can hardly be less than a hundred and ten miles. It was impossible to distinguish the sound, except in one account, the battle did not begin till half past eleven. But on this there was a explanation that, if the clock near the field of Waterloo kept Brussels time, and that at Hythe kept Greenwich time, there was, at the time, the difference of longitude would go far to fill up this gap. Hythe was in the county of Kent, in southeast of England where, it is believed, the noise of the Waterloo guns was heard. On the afternoon of that eventful Sunday a party of gentlemen residing at Walmer was walking in his garden, when his attention was arrested by a sound which he supposed at first to be sandy soil as if it were being invisibly shaken. He called the attention of his old gardener to this circumstance, inquiring of him: "Then, Sir, there's going going on t'other side; I have seen this before when there has been fighting." It is not recorded that the natural sound was heard on this occasion; but this kind of earth-trembling is another well-known effect of such phenomena. Some difficulty arises in understanding these matters when it is asserted that the sound of the same guns was heard at Sir General Colville's four counting the Mons road at a distance of not more than a hundred and fifty miles. Men of science, however, are conversant with the fact that different layers or strata of atmosphere, however great a particular spot may, in hot weather, have different degrees of density and moisture, reflecting sound in their power of conveying a curious vibrations to a distance. Nevertheless, the facts ought to be stated honestly, whether they seem to be for or against any particular theory. Not only in Kent, but further north, was the sound held. In some of the Midland counties at Stairvell Gap, near Aldborough, in Suffolk, heard sounds at the very time of the battle, which seemed to have come from the German Ocean.

As to meteorological and volcanic phenomena, which lie beyond the limit of man's control, it is scarcely possible to guess the maximum distance to which sound may penetrate. When the meteor or fire-ball of 1719 burst in the air, at a height of nearly seven miles above the earth's surface, it sounded like a large cannon, or even—as some said—a broadside. When the great meteor of 1783 fell a mile in diameter—rushed along with a speed of twenty miles a second, and set a height of fifty miles, it gave out a sort of hissing noise at first sound. These distances may not appear very great; but we must bear in mind that at such high altitudes the atmosphere is of extraordinary tenuity, little fitted to convey any sonorous impulses whatever. Geologists and physical geographers have placed upon record the fact that, in 1815, the Tomboro Mountain, in the island of Sumbawa, in the course of a volcanic activity from April to July; and that on one particular day the noise of the frightful convulsion was heard at the city of Ternate, seven hundred miles, and even at Sumatra, nine hundred miles distant in the opposite direction. Extending to the second given by Sir Stamford Raffles this must have been one of the most terrible volcanic eruptions on record. Of twelve thousand persons living on the island all were destroyed except a mere handful. Hurricanes arose which carried up into the air men and horses as well as trees uprooted from the ground. The sound was heard in the neighboring islands as to darken the sir no or three hundred miles off, and to form a bed in the sea two feet thick and several miles wide, which produced a shoal on the west side of Sumatra. In Java these ashes produced a darkness more than midnight at mid-sight. The sea rose suddenly on the coast of Sumbawa from two to twelve feet, coming a wave which rushed entirely up all the rivers, and placed the town of Tomboro under water. So far as we are aware, this distance is the greatest at which sound has ever been heard.

THE MENDICANT ORDERS.

THE idea of the mendicant orders originated in the head of Johnn Bernardini, the good-for-nothing son of a shop-keeper in Assisi, in Umbria. He is known under the name of St. Francis of Assisi, or "the poor man." All that, however, well in his father's business he became a soldier, and was taken prisoner, and fell sick. It is not clear how he became a saint, for at first he appeared to be an idiot; of whom the infallible Pope Honorius himself said, "that he was a simpleton." He kept the lowest company, wore the most filthy rags, and piously robbed his father to get means for the restoration of a ruined Church. However, the Bishop of Assisi took him under his protection, and seems to have seen about the country begging for his Church, with such unexpected success that he conceived the idea of instituting a mendicant order. Though Pope Honorius despised him, Innocent III., equally infallible, confirmed the code which Francis drew up for his new order, notwithstanding his infallibility's having called it, at first, "a rule for pigs, but not for human beings."

"Alms," Francis declared, "are our heritage, alms are our justice, begging is our purpose and our royal dignity; ignominy and contempt are our honor and our glory on the day of judgment." Francis was the best example of humility. In the commencement he was very much laughed at; but after nine or four years the reputation of his sanctity stood so high that the clergy and people came to meet him in procession when he approached a city, and the bells of all the churches welcomed him. The more the street boys threw dirt at or pelted him with, the better he was pleased. When he went about begging in Assisi he got every kind of alms that he received into the same pot, and when he became hungry he fed from the heterogeneous mess. Once, invited to dinner by a cardinal, he did not touch any of the dainty dishes, but stuck to his pot, to the disgust of all the guests. He loved the lower animals very much, and called them his brothers and sisters. He frequently prayed and to geese, ducks, and fishes; and when once the swallows and sparrows disturbed him by their twittering, he asked his "dear sisters" to keep quiet. For recreation, he rolled himself on thorns, went up to the neck in freezing ponds, and lay in the snow. He died in 1226; but during his life the number of Franciscan monks was very great, and after his death increased to 5,000 monks and 8,000 nuns in the ten-there. The Franciscan General offered Pope Pius III. an army of fifty thousand Franciscans if he was war against the Turks. Though a great many convents were destroyed by the Reformation, there was still existing, at the beginning of the last century, seven thousand monasteries and nine hundred nunneries of this order.

The sworn enemies of the Franciscans were the Dominicans, whose origin dates from about the same time. They are named after St. Dominicus, a Spaniard, whose name was Dominic Guzman. He was sent to France to convert some heretics (the Waldenses), and there contrived the idea of instituting a monks' order for the instruction of the people. He received permission from the Pope; and to this order the Romish Church owes the introduction of the Inquisition and the censorship of books.

It is a very significant fact, that notwithstanding the long period of THIRTY YEARS that the "Paper Killer" has been before the world, it has never lost one whit of its popularity; but, on the contrary, the call for it has steadily increased from its first discovery, and on no previous time has the demand been so great, or the quantity made been so large, as at the present. The numerous people have found it to be all that it was claimed to be; and hence it is popular, and always will be.

FRENCH COMMANDERS.

WE give on this page the portraits of five of the most eminent of the French commanders now opposed to the Prussians along the Rhine. First in ability and renown is Marshal M'MAHON, Duke of Magenta, who was born at Sully, July 13, 1808. He is a descendant of an old Irish Catholic family, attached to the STUARTS. He entered the military school of St. Cyr in 1825, won his first laurels in Algeria, where he fought in numerous battles and minor engagements, and became conspicuous through his bravery and daring during the assault on Constantine. His superiority as a tactician became soon apparent, and was fully appreciated and rewarded by rapid advancement. His long career as a military commander in the colony, and his never-ceasing activity in behalf of the firm establishment of French authority in Northern Africa, were interrupted, for some time at least, by his recall to France in 1855. It was not, however, the intention of the government to let him remain inactive; he was, on the contrary, immediately assigned to the command of a division of infantry, forming part of the army under Marshal Bosquet. Here he laid the foundation of his military glory by the ever-memorable and successful assault on the Malakoff fortifications at Sebastopol, which had generally been considered impregnable. In 1857 he returned to Algeria, forced the revolting Kabyles into submission, and was soon after appointed commander-in-chief of all the French forces there on land and sea. The outbreak of the Italian war, in 1859, caused his return to France, when he was assigned to the command of the Second Corps of the Army of the Alps. The victory of Magenta has been mainly attributed to the brilliant action of Marshal M'MAHON, who was accordingly created Duke of Magenta on the field of battle.

Marshal CANROBERT was born June 27, 1809. He was admitted to the military school of St. Cyr in 1825, which he left in 1828 to enter the 17th regiment of the line as Second Lieutenant, and soon after joined the military expedition to Mascara, fought bravely in several engagements against the hostile tribes in Northern Africa, and assisted at the storming of Constantine in 1837. He was sent back to France in 1839 for the purpose of forming a battalion for the foreign legion out of the dispersed bands of Carlists. He succeeded in this, and returned to Africa in 1841, where he was intrusted with the command of a battalion of chasseurs à pied and of the 64th regiment of the line, suppressed the rebellion of Bon Maza, and during eight months of desperate fighting forced most of the revolting tribes of Kabyles into submission. He was engaged in various parts of Northern Africa for nearly eight years, led some of the most daring and adventurous expeditions into the interior, and every where distinguished himself by his coolness, bravery, and quick adaptation to the warfare he had to resort to. Returning to France, he proved by his services to LOUIS NAPOLEON that he meant to be a firm supporter of the new regime, and in fact he has ever since been one of the staunchest friends and firmest adherents to the Second Empire. He was made General of Division in 1853, took part in the expedition to the Crimea, and when Marshal ST. ARNAUD felt his end approaching he transmitted the command of the entire French army to CANROBERT. This was in accordance with an order given in a private letter by the Emperor NAPOLEON himself. Having won new laurels at the sanguinary battles of Inkermann, Balaklava, and Eupatoria, he conferred with Lord RAGLAN, commander of the British forces, and urged him to participate in an immediate assault on Sebastopol. The two commanders being unable to agree, and Lord RAGLAN steadily refusing to co-operate in the intended movement, CANROBERT resigned in favor of General PELISSIER, and left the Crimea two months after. During the Italian campaign, in 1859, he commanded the Third Army Corps, fought at Magenta, and afterward contributed most essentially to the decisive victory of the French army at the battle of Solferino.

MARSHAL M'MAHON.

Marshal BAZAINE was born February 13, 1811. He studied at the Polytechnic School in Paris, and entered the army in Africa when twenty years old. After six years of uninterrupted warfare against the Kabyles and other hostile tribes, he was assigned to the foreign legion, and sent into Spain in 1837 to suppress the Carlist movement in that country. He returned to Algeria in 1839, joined the expedition against Milianah and Morocco, and was for several years Governor of the Arabian subdivision of Tlemcen. During the Crimean war, where he was in command of a brigade of infantry, he is said to have distinguished himself by his bravery and by his talent for organization. When the Russians had evacuated Sebastopol, BAZAINE was made Governor of the place. He took no part in the campaign against Austria in 1859, but was intrusted with the command of the expedition to Mexico in 1862. The Emperor NAPOLEON, taking advantage of the civil war then raging in the United States, conceived the idea of establishing an empire at our southern frontier, hoping thus to prepare the way for the final supremacy of the Latin race on this continent. The attempt proved a failure. French pride was humiliated, and the army compelled to re-embark toward the close of 1866. As to the prominent part of Marshal BAZAINE in this unlucky enterprise, it will be long remembered by the Mexican people. From the time of his landing at Vera Cruz until his hasty exit from the country of the MONTEZUMAS, he is known to have looked upon the Mexicans as a mongrel race of barbarians, to whom, however, he was only too ready to set an example of barbarism not equaled in civilized warfare.

General FROSSARD, commander of the Second Army Corps, was born April 26, 1807. From 1825 to 1827 he was a pupil of the Polytechnic School. During the administration of General CAVAIGNAC he was made a Lieutenant-Colonel, and took part in the expedition which put an end to the Roman Republic. Having gained the reputation of being one of the most eminent officers in point of military science, and in particular in the art of fortification, he was appointed, in 1852, director of the fortifications of Oran, in Algeria, with the rank of Colonel, and subsequently, after being appointed General of Brigade, member of the Committee of Fortifications. In 1859 he took part as General of Division in the Italian campaign. After serving as aid-de-camp to the Emperor, and member of the Committee of Defense, General FROSSARD was, by decree of March 15, 1867, made Chief of the Military Household of the Emperor and Governor of the Prince Imperial, whose military instruction he is said to have conducted with military rigor. At the beginning of the year 1869 he was appointed President of the Committee of Fortifications.

General DE FAILLY was born in 1808. He received his military education at St. Cyr, and was at the time of the revolution of 1848 Lieutenant-Colonel of a regiment of the line. He took part in the Crimean war as Brigadier-General, and greatly distinguished himself at the battles of the Alma, of the Mamelon, and of the Malakoff. He commanded a division in the Italian campaign, and was wounded at the battle of Solferino. He was afterward appointed Governor of Paris, and Commander-in-Chief of the Second Army Corps.

GENERAL FROSSARD.

GENERAL DE FAILLY.

Jon-Vert, and of Tract tit. After his return he was made aid-de-camp of the Emperor, and during the Italian war he commanded a division of the army corps of General NIEL, and distinguished himself at Magenta and Solferino. In 1867 he was selected to put down the Garibaldian movement, and in this campaign made the first trial on a large scale of the chassepot, which, as he said in his report, worked wonderfully at Mentana. In October, 1869, General FAILLY was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Third Army Corps, and is now at the head of the Fifth Corps.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 20, 1870.

THE CAMPAIGN AT HOME.

THE Republican party in New York will hold its Convention for the nomination of Governor in September, and its own condition and the situation of the country require a plain and emphatic declaration of principles, and the most vigorous and harmonious action. That will be the most important election before the next Presidential campaign, and, although it will not determine the position of the New York in that campaign, it will be an immense encouragement or discouragement to the party throughout the country. It is, therefore, essential that the Convention fully understand the situation, and its first consideration should be that it must address itself to actual questions. The war is over. Reconstruction is accomplished. The Democratic party, which perplexed and prolonged the war, has not, indeed, acquiesced in the result. That must not be forgotten. And if that party should choose to contest the Presidential election of 1872 upon the ground of a refusal to acknowledge the validity of the amendments, and of a resolution to reopen the whole subject of reconstruction, it would be as overwhelmingly defeated as it was in 1864 upon a platform of surrender to the rebellion, or in 1868 upon that of repudiation and rebel acceptance.

But although the folly of that party seems to be exhaustless, it is not expedient to take it for granted. A wise general credits his antagonist with sagacity that his own victory may be surer and more splendid. The country knows that the Republican party has saved the integrity and honor of the Union, that it has reconstructed it upon principles of justice, and has confirmed its great work by constitutional amendments. It knows, also, that the party will defend its own work. But it does not seriously believe that the Democratic party will undertake to disturb the settlements, and the public attention is, therefore, fixed upon other points. Perhaps the most immediately pressing and unnerving question is that of the financial policy. What is the Republican principle on this subject?

Take no project of it—that of taxation. The country is heavily taxed. Taxes must necessarily continue to be heavy for a long time. But upon what principle shall they be laid? Shall the country be taxed now to pay the debt, or shall the burden be shared with those who follow us? In other words, shall taxation be reduced?

It is a proud fact that during the year and a half of General GRANT'S administration the decrease of the public debt has been $156,138,784 01. Meanwhile, also, Congress has sometimes reduced taxation. But is the Administration stronger, is the continued ascendency of the party surer for those facts? And if not, what is the reason? Is it not that the policy of reduction is not believed to be a general and acknowledged party policy? The debate upon the tariff, the action upon the income tax, the declaration of leading Republican journals that the burden ought to be temporarily borne, showed plainly enough that the reduction was rather a chance than a policy. Now, upon such a subject at this time, no party can hope to succeed if it has not a distinct and declared principle. It can not shuffle and evade. Shuffling is confusion. Evasion is defeat. It must pronounce plainly in the expectation will, for a reduction of taxes or against it.

It is further desirable that this be done, because, after the action of Congress upon the President's proposition to buy foreign ships, every candidate for the House must satisfy his constituents as to his views of a true revenue system. A great party can not have two opinions upon that subject when that subject is of immediate and commanding importance. It is useless to say that the Democratic party also has no unanimity upon that point, because we ought not to depend upon the folly of the enemy. Their action may be no wiser than ours. But they have the immense advantage of professing only; they can not be tried, as we are, by practice. Every faithful Republican wishes to be just to the general patriotic purpose of the late House of Representatives. But every Republican member of that House, looking calmly at the proceedings and results of the last session, must doubt whether, upon the whole, its action was an advantage to the party. It is contended on every side that the Democratic party will largely increase its force in the next House. And what was the reason of the discord of this last session, and of the party dissatisfaction with its results? It is very plain. It is that the House was dealing with questions for the consideration of which it was not elected. Consequently its last act was the extraordinary one to which we recently alluded as so significant. It refused to approve the recommendation of the President to enable the country to take a proper advantage of the opportunity presented by the war in Europe.

Now the Republican majority in the next House will be smaller, and if, upon so vital a subject as the general prosperity and policy of the country, it has no opinion, or has two very positive opinions, the Democratic minority will control legislation, and the Republican Administration will be paralyzed. We can not expect, if that should be the case, that the country in 1872 will support a party which has shown that what it thinks upon the gravest public questions. It does not seem to us possible to avoid the necessity of plain action in the party platforms. It certainly will be impossible for Congressional candidates who hope to be elected. And the party leaders should have learned that of all policies timidity and obscurity are the worst. When the rebellion was thundering at the government and people, the Democratic party did not falter. It called a rebel, rebel; and a Copperhead, Copperhead. It laid heavy hands; it decreed a draft, and it drafted men. No party ever did a greater work more gloriously.

All this is not to be forgotten. On the contrary, it is to be perpetually remembered, but remembered for instruction and inspiration. And the party leaders should have learned that of all policies timidity and obscurity are the worst. When the rebellion was thundering at the government and people, the Democratic party did not falter. It called a rebel, rebel; and a Copperhead, Copperhead. It laid heavy hands; it decreed a draft, and it drafted men. No party ever did a greater work more gloriously.

All this is not to be forgotten. On the contrary, it is to be perpetually remembered, but remembered for instruction and inspiration. The party leaders should have learned that a gunmount purpose, to which every member was answeringly devoted. That purpose was plainly declared and fearlessly pursued. It is the secret of political success. But are we not becoming timid and, therefore, feeble? In the apprehension of losing the support of this interest or of that, are we not compromising the essential conditions of victory? The want of a unanimous policy apparent in the action of Congress has placed us somewhat at a disadvantage. But an appeal to our old glories, inserted in their day, will not restore them. Are we the men for this? Let us prove it by showing the same faith, the same sagacity, the same devotion. The past is never enough. Even Marathon could not save MILTIADES.

THE CUBAN SITUATION.

IF the report be true that General DE RODAS in the Spanish Governor-General of Cuba, has asked for fifteen thousand troops, it is evident that the struggle upon the island is not yet ended. It has all the general characteristics of the revolution of the Spanish American colonies in the earlier part of the century. That was a conflict which began in 1810, and smouldered along for twenty years. Spain steadily refused to acknowledge the independence of the colonies although it was a manifest fact. They had established governments which, were in full and successful operation; collecting revenue, raising and maintaining armies, and beginning navies. They had strengthened themselves internally, and had concluded treaties of amity and commerce with other states. Great Britain and the United States appointed consuls to reside at South American ports; and the declaration of Monroe doctrine was a very distinct growl of sympathy with the colonies upon the part of the United States.

Yet this was apparently aloof from the struggle. It knew that the principle of armed intervention in foreign quarrels is destructive of civilization. That principle practically asserted by the Holy Alliance in Spain, and its adoption by the United States would have been the dissolution by the great republic of the most monstrous modern claim of despotism. They were not, however, bound to conceal their sympathy with liberty, and they did not conceal them. In 1825 Mr. CLAY, as Secretary of State, instructed Mr. MIDDLETON, our Minister in Russia, to use that government to use its influence with Spain to acknowledge the facts of the situation in South America. But Russia was the champion of the Holy Alliance, and, of course, declined. In his letter Mr. CLAY said:

> "In the war which has so long been raging between Spain and her colonies the United States have taken no part, either to produce or to sustain it. They have been interested lookers-on spectators of the progressions. Their frankness forbids, however, that they should say that they have been indifferent to the feelings of indifference. They have, on the contrary, cautiously refrained from any act which a just neutrality should require and enjoy that independence with which, by the valor and the patriotism of the countries or their liberty, they have been, under the favor of Heaven, so greatly blessed. But, in the indulgence of this sympathetic feeling, they have not, for one moment, been unmindful of the duties of that neutrality which they had deliberately announced. And the best proof of the fidelity with which they have strictly fulfilled its obligations is furnished by the fact that during the progress of the war they have been unjustly accused by both parties of violating their declared neutrality."

These words well state the attitude of the United States during the present contest in Cuba. They have not, indeed, declared neutrality, for obvious reasons. But they have been morally neutral. They have faithfully enforced their own laws and observed their own treaties. But American citizens who sympathized with the efforts of the revolutionary party in Cuba have frankly declared themselves. That there has been the same unanimity or warmth of sympathy which attended the earlier South American struggle or the contest of recent years in Europe we do not believe, and the reasons of this apathy we have heretofore mentioned. It is undeniable that the situation in Cuba is generally regarded with languid indifference, and the exhaustion, doubtless, is the feeling which could not have existed in the earlier revolution, but which results from the experience of the colonies since their separation from Spain, that the prospect of liberty and self-government in Cuba, after its independence, is almost hopeless. The experience of South America has shown that the name of republic is not a security either of freedom or prosperity.

The recent expedition of General DE RODAS to the scene of the revolution in Cuba has manifestly failed. Although he has a large force of Spanish soldiers and the volunteer army, and although the ports and chief towns, which the insurgents are sternly armed, and the expeditions to aid them are frustrated, the war has not ceased. It is the earlier day in South America, and at the end of the second year the Governor invokes heavy reinforcements. The home government will hardly wish to spare good soldiers just as a war begins in Europe, of which the condition of Spain has furnished the occasion. In this situation, therefore, Cuba will apparently be indefinitely prolonged, unless some peculiar complication should invite the interference of other governments.

THE NORTH CAROLINA TROUBLES.

THERE has been in certain quarters, notorious for sympathy with the late rebels and rebellion, such a vehement denunciation of Governor HOLDEN of North Carolina, as a peculiarly malignant "satrap," who was waging fiendish war upon "the people" of North Carolina, that it is well to understand the facts. The organization of the KU-KLUX Klan has been especially vigilant in that State, where the comparative weakness of the colored population promised what a rigorous system of terror and coercion would practically annul their vote. To this end the offices of the KU-KLUX have been directed. Of the existence and operations of this body there is no question. We have ourselves given thousands of its proceedings from the most "conservative" authority. It is the natural result of the war. It is a sucker from the root of the rebellion.

That there must be disturbances of all kinds in the States of the rebellion there was, of course, no question. That great care and forbearance would be necessary upon the part of the civil authorities was evident; and that it was very desirable to restore the normal condition of society as soon as practicable was unquestionable from the first. It was the duty of the civil officers of the States to postpone appeals to military interference to the last possible moment; and this was most desirable, not only in itself and upon general principles, but, for the Republican party, upon partisan grounds. For it was clear that an appeal to force would injure the party in two ways: first, it would suggest the suspicion that it was, as has been alleged of the present difficulty in North Carolina, organized for party purposes; and, in the second place, it would be cited as proof of the inefficiency of Republican reconstruction. So for every reason, therefore, it was most desirable that the civil authority should be every where paramount.

But it was equally evident that in the condition of society which the war left in the States of the rebellion there must necessarily be such occasional explosions of the peace, so organized, so persistent, so formidable, that the ordinary civil processes would not avail. It was unreasonable, and that the disordered States would be restored to a normal situation without very serious troubles, in which military interference would be wholly justified. And precisely this is the case in North Carolina. The crimes of the KU-KLUX defied the civil authorities. The Governor, who is by the responsible executive officer, states, as a fact, what all the probabilities confirm, that the organized resistance and assassins laughed at proclamations, exhortations, and the civil process, and he was compelled either to tolerate crimes which he knew, or to use military force. He decided not to surrender to the rebels, and placed certain counties under martial law, and invoked, as the Constitution authorizes, the assistance of the national power, which was promptly granted. Governor HOLDEN did what Governor KING, of Rhode Island, did in the "DORR war" in that State in 1842.

Of course, a Governor is to be held responsible for his invoking national aid before it is necessary; if he does not exhaust the lawful resources of the State before this final appeal; and if he permits any abuse of the military interference when it becomes indispensable. But the passionate assertion of his partisan opponents can not be accepted as evidence of his guilt. We have the testimony of the Chief Justice of the State, that the power of the civil process was exhausted. And while there is unquestionably exaggeration in all the reports, no one who has been a faithful student of the spirit and methods of the KU-KLUX Klan will believe that the action of the Governor has been merely a partisan trick to carry the election.

RAISING THE STANDARD.

THE advantage of adhering to a humane principle in public affairs has been recently very conspicuously illustrated. When, in the early days of the late war, Captain WILKES, upon the San Jacinto, took Messrs. SLIDELL and MASON from the British mail steamer Trent, there was a loud shout of exultation in this country, answered by a stern alternative from Great Britain of immediate surrender of the prisoners or war. The belief in the United States was very general that we had a right to hold the prisoners. Mr. EVERETT, one of our most accomplished students of international law, took substantially that ground. Governor ANDREW asserted it in Faneuil Hall. The feeling of the country was thoroughly aroused, and it was only deepened and exasperated by the crisp and haughty tone of Great Britain. But Mr. SEWARD promptly replied to the demand of Lord LYONS, the British Minister, and assented to the surrender upon American principles; and in reply to the question, what he considers the most critical moment of the war, Mr. SEWARD afterward said that it was the time which elapsed between his informal communication of the purport of his note and the rejoinder of Lord LYONS that it would be satisfactory. "I knew," said Mr. SEWARD, "that I had gone as far as public opinion would tolerate, and that if my note were not satisfactory then would be war."

It is well afterward Mr. SUMNER made his admirable and conclusive speech upon the subject. He showed clearly, from the British admiralty precedents, and from the action of the British government, that every objection made to the conduct of the American officer in the case of Messrs. SLIDELL and MASON was justified by British precedents; but he contended that the best American precedent and practice demanded their release; and, therefore, in obedience to our own just and honorable principles of maritime rights and neutrality, the prisoners should be surrendered. They were surrendered, and the country acquiesced without a word. This lofty position in regard to neutral rights was taken at a time always critical, and when the Congress of Paris proposed to elevate the standard of international comity, the United States said, "We will agree if you will secure it a little higher." The Congress declined. But that principle, harmonious with the national practice and precedent, has been indistinguishably the United States, and we now see the signs of its speedy adoption into international law.

It was recently stated, Prussia, one of the parties to the treaty of Paris, declares that the American principle shall govern its conduct during the present war. Secretary FISH, in acknowledging the official communication of this decision from the Prussian Minister, refers with true pride to the traditional tendency of the United States upon the subject, and hopes that their government and people may soon see their principles generally universally adopted as another humanising rule of war. The Prussian Minister responds that he sincerely trusts his government will co-operate to that good end, the United States have no reason to be ashamed of their contribution to international law. In the case of Ireland the right of visit was, as asserted by the greatest maritime power in the world, and that right is abandoned. In 1856 we stood upon the inviolability of private property upon the ocean, and that inviolability is now acknowledged by one of the greatest states in Europe, and one not fond to become practice of civilization. "Meanwhile," as Mr. SUMNER said at the end of his speech upon the Trent case, "we shall remain for us to uphold the perpetual policy of the republic and to stand fast on the ancient ways."

THE LESSON OF THE DAY.

THE profound feeling caused by the murder of Mr. NATHAN is not due to the event nor to the circumstances alone, but to the general feeling that the community is defenceless against criminals. In a society which covers with ôdium successful crime of a certain kind, all crime is encouraged, and a great city which is full of "dangerous classes," whose favor is unscrupulously propitiated by demagogues, and which elects criminal judges and prosecuting officers by the popular vote, is a place in which great crimes must be expected. It is not necessary, therefore, to jump to the conclusion that popular governments foster crime; but it is necessary to perceive that popular governments of themselves are no security against it.

We may be very sure that there is a not very obscure connection between such facts as the career of FLORENCE SCANNEL and his honorable absorption and the murder of Mr. NATHAN. In a city where one of the chief magistrates, elected by popular vote, busts into a drinking saloon with riotous intentions, and is shot in the attempt to shoot others, and afterward dying is buried with honor, the officers of police and criminal judges attending, and a clergyman preaching over the coffin that of such is the kingdom of heaven—in such a city it is surely not surprising that a worthy citizen is murdered in his own house, and in a most public quarter. The remedy lies not in changing the system of police. If we wish to repress crime we must flatter criminals. If persons of position, who are technically called respectable, do not hesitate to countenance voters and judges, why should any body be surprised at disorder? A successful swindling on the great scale covers a swindler with good-honored society, why should forgers despair of humorous repute, or murderers be shunned?

To remodel a police system, yet still to leave it in the control of those who depend upon the favor of the criminal classes, and who invoke their aid to break the laws upon election day, is to imitate the hunter in the old story, and merely to change the emphasis: "You may take the river, and I'll take the shore, or I'll take the turkey, and you may take the crow." Those, therefore, who support the infamous abuse of the present system in New York, who think the interest of their party, whatever it may be, superior to the welfare of the community—those who sustain, by speech and voting, the demagogues who directly use the criminal classes for political ends—are really responsible for the feeling of security which follows the murder of a respectable citizen.

Universal disorder, as well as general corruption, is one of the consequences of a politicized party spirit. And until the intelligent and sober citizens of New York resolutely combine, regardless of party, in stigmatizing and suppressing the demagogery which repeats in their city the excesses and abuses of the old European republics, all superficial changes in the police system will be futile; men like Mr. NATHAN and Mr. ROGERS will still be mysteriously murdered, and judges and politicians will still follow with honor the coffin of FLORENCE SCANNEL.

THE ERMINE AND THE TIARA.

Now that papal infallibility is declared, there must be somebody to explain the explanations of it which we offered. BUTORDA, the founder of one of the most widely received religions of the world, was called omniscient by his earliest pupils. But it was presently discovered that he made the same mistakes with regard to the shape of the earth and similar subjects that every body else did. Thereupon the Buddhist doctors limited his infallibility to the religious doctrines of his system. They said, gravely: "BUDDHA does not at all times exercise his omniscience. This is evidently proved by facts. It would clearly be a great blunder to declare a man infallible upon any point susceptible of proof; and upon those that are not very many may flatter himself that he is infallible, or agree that any body else is so.

We have been reminded of the Buddhist doctors by the report of a recent discourse by DR. STARRS, a Roman Catholic clergyman in this city, in which he undertook an explanation of the inexplicable. The Pope, it seems, according to the Doctor, is fallible as a man, but infallible as the mouth-piece of the Holy Ghost as Pope. That he may be fallible as a man is incontestible. Pope Alexander the Sixth, RODRIGO BORGIA, is a striking illustration of that truth. But the Œcumenical Council might well have been troubled by the question that was asked about him: "Was Pope RODRIGO BORGIA goes to—the place of torment, what will become of poor Pope Alexander?" And it is not quite an awkward requirement to have the absolute truth upon the holiest subjects delivered by one of the very worst of men? Or shall we say the worse the Pope the greater the miracle?

But DR. STARRS, with consummate infelicity, compares the decisions of the Pope to those of the Supreme Court, because there is no appeal, and the country submits to them as final. But is infallibility any more than this? Is it a convenience of organization? The Chief Justice does not assume to declare what is just, but only what is law. Nor does he claim any thing more than that the necessity of the case requires that the opinion of the Court shall be accepted as law; and when declared it stands only until it is reversed. If infallibility means nothing more than the decision of a majority in a presbytery, or the governing body of any Church, which from a corresponding necessity of the case must be accepted as the final ruling by which the Church is to be governed, then the Œcumenical mountain has produced the very smallest of mice.

Unquestionably, under the decree of infallibility, the decisions of the Pope so far resemble the decisions of the Supreme Court that they are final. But they are so not upon any ground of mere convenience or necessity, as in the case of the Court, but for reasons totally different. The decree of infallibility expressly declares: "This gift of the truth of faith with which faith fails not has, therefore, been divinely accorded to Peter and to his successors in the chair." Thus, when the Pope speaks upon a point of faith, under this decree his word is the infallible statement of absolute truth, from which there is no appeal, not because there must be an arbitrarily final decision somewhere, but because it is essential truth. A chief justice may, indeed, be a very bad J., as was a very good lawyer. But neither his character nor his learning determine the fit, or the fitness, of his judgments. That finality rests solely upon the ground of social convenience. But the dogma of infallibility, as expounded by the doctors, involves the absurdity that in a finally unreasonable and unjust and especially adapted to human beings the absolute divine truth upon vital points of faith may be proclaimed by a man whose life may outrage every moral law and every pure instinct of humanity.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY AND MANUAL LABOR.

We have great pleasure in publishing the following letter from Vice-President RUSSEL of Cornell University. It relates to one of the questions of hundreds of young men in the country, and will save them and the authorities of the University the trouble of a more particular correspondence.

"MY DEAR SIR,—The case presented by you in a very common one—that of a young man anxious to be educated, but without the means of certain support. That means are, in the absence of money, skilled manual labor or ability to teach. Any one who comes here with skill or ability to teach, and with moderate means, can generally find work enough in the village to support him economically. In the present demand for carpenters there is no difficulty in finding employment. Printers, too, do very well, either in the village or out in the country, on which we employ a printer. Mr. Stone-cutters do not keep up with the demands for stone for the fine buildings. The present fine demand is subject to fluctuation; but, as a general rule, a skilful and steady workman will find ample employment here to pay the expenses of his education.

"You are correct in supposing that the University assumes no responsibility for work, neither promising work nor guaranteeing that there will be any. It is always give the students the preference as to any work of our own; but in every other respect they stand in the same position as other mechanics seeking employment. Does your friend understand printing? If so, Stone-cutters do not keep up with the demands for stone for the fine buildings. The present fine demand is subject to fluctuation; but, as a general rule, a skilful and steady workman will find ample employment here to pay the expenses of his education.

"You are correct in supposing that the University assumes no responsibility for work, neither promising work nor guaranteeing that there will be any. It is always give the students the preference as to any work of our own; but in every other respect they stand in the same position as other mechanics seeking employment. Does your friend understand printing? If so, grading will favor; a small number attend at the compositor's table. Students board themselves in clubs or messes.

"Suppose, however, that he should find employment of this kind, how far would it support him? Twenty-five hours a week, all he could work, at fifteen cents an hour, all he could get, would be about four dollars his expenses, which can hardly be reduced below $3 a per week, to pay for washing, fuel, lights, books and clothes. There is, therefore, no safety in relying on unskilled labor as a means of education.

"One of those days Mr. CORNELL, if he live, will establish workshops for giving manual training on unskilled labor. The students in the departments of Mechanic Arts will be taught to make models, which may be sold. Our projected bookbindery will employ some, and our printing-office will employ a growing business, will need more hands. Every thing in the future is encouraging; and I see no reason to doubt that, in time, facilities for such work will be provided for all who need it as a means of paying for their education.

"For the present, however, we must wait while our institution grows, and for the growth of its business. It is hard that young men like the one on whose behalf you write should not pay for their education as ardently, which would add so much to their usefulness and happiness, and to the general working power of society; but the same has always been the case, and we are now so keenly sensitive to the same evil that we just now begin to see how it can be remedied.

"When Mr. CORNELL's wealth increases by fifty large rivers generally flow near large cities,' somebody will ask why the hydraulic power of Fall Creek is not then been waited for centuries of summers and winters. Should he cannot do anything for the present. But he did Nature place an unfailing power for industry and steady employment and education for the multitude of every one who desires to learn? Can you set your manufacturers thinking about it? It is a simple problem. Given mountains with mines, many, but needing men and water-power; water-power roaring for employment; men needing employment; a University, with education, but needing money; how to get the most of all the supplies?

"If some of your smart men will solve that, we shall never again be troubled by the cry that rich merchants' sons who come to us for education, offering their arms and brains and all for the privilege of work. Until then, however, I can not encourage your young friend to come.

"WILLIAM C. RUSSEL, Vice-President."

NOW AND THEN

MR. GLADSTONE was loudly cheered in the House of Commons when he said that "If soldiers are chartered to attend the rect of a belligerent, to supply coal, they will, to all practical intents and purposes, become store-ships attached to that fleet." The general rule is, that only contraband of war for a belligerent may be justly seized in a neutral vessel. But here the rather hopeless wilderness of distinctions in international law begins for what is contraband of war. Provisions have been sometimes considered as contraband, and bovines. One definition embraces whatever may be useful in war. But what may not? General current decencies forbid arms and ammunition of all kinds to be contraband. But the question always arises upon articles in themselves innocent. Treaties usually define what shall be considered contraband. The latest authorities, however, agree that, since articles of direct use in war are from time to time changing, new articles, such as steam-engines and coals, can be considered contraband only when there is satisfactory proof that they are for the direct uses of war.

This is precisely the case stated by Mr. GLADSTONE, and it is the duty of the British Government to prevent such transactions. But as we read of the admirable alertness of Great Britain in the matter of her neutral duties in this war, it is impossible not to wish that she had been always as solicitous and ready. For how very long a time the Alabama was allowed the most satisfactory proof that the Alabama was intended for the direct uses of war by a belligerent before Earl RUSSEL and the Government were able to see it! How loudly the House of Commons which cheered Mr. GLADSTONE on the other day, cheered Mr. LAIRD years ago! Mr. GLADSTONE said that neutrality required the Government to stop the sale of coal to a belligerent. Mr. LAIRD said that neutrality authorized him to sell ships to a belligerent. The excited House equally applauded both. It is not doubted that the people of England will see and consider these facts; and ask themselves whether, if the vigorous care of 1870 be honorable neutrality, the easy-going care of the indifference of 1862–63 was equally creditable?

NOTES.

THE most exciting news for some time will probably reach us to-day, and the Tribune and London correspondents has shown great zeal in forwarding interesting intelligence. But we hope that the news is not to be fed during our way. REUTER loved the rebels, and served up his AMERICAN news with a true rebel flavor accordingly. The Tribune, with the rest of the world, loves the Prussians in this war; but we trust that its love will not blind it to the fact that it is its first duty to those who rely upon it to tell the truth, and not what it wishes to be true. On the 23rd of July the London correspondent telegraphed that its special Paris correspondent wrote on the 24th, "I have just returned from the French with less enthusiasm or more distrust of success," etc., etc. But on the 2d of July its regular Paris correspondent wrote: "I have been a spectator during our great war, which was popular on the part of the people, and can say emphatically I am seeing now with what I saw at home, I can not for a moment doubt that in throwing down that glove in the face of the Government had, and knew it had, the vast body of the people at its back, and that the new news of the firing upon Sumter.....There is a prodigious surface enthusiasm for the war, but below this boiling there is a deep, strong, serious current sweeping all before it." It is very evident that the special correspondent is not to be trusted again; and certainly nothing will be gained in sympathy for one side by belittling the feeling and success of the other.

We can readily believe that Governor HOFFMAN did not write his letter declining to commute the punishment of RICAL without pain. He was doing the most difficult official duty that devolves upon a humane man. But his great predecessor, Governor SEWARD, truly stated the principle that should govern executive action under appeals for mercy. "The power of pardoning is committed by the Constitution to the prudence and discretion, and not the wishes or feelings of the pardoning power." It is plain that in RICAL'S very few convicts would be long imprisoned..... To pardon or not to pardon does not depend upon any will, but upon judgment; and for the impartial and discreet exercise of this authority I am not ought to be held responsible." With the same conviction Governor HOFFMAN says: "My judgment, however, tells me that the prisoner was justly convicted of murder, and that the interests of the community demand that he should suffer the penalty." It is the peculiar function which belongs to the case of REAL has exercised, and the undeniably growing humility in the public mind in regard to capital punishment, supervisory suggests the question whether the penalty of murder would not be more surely inflicted, and the ends of justice more conveniently attained, if the punishment were changed.

SOME of the more devoted members of the New York branch of the American Freedmen's Union Commission have been unwilling to relinquish their good work, and have continued it by means of subscriptions and the personal control with them. During the last year the "Continuing Committee" has employed, for different terms, fifty-five teachers, of whom forty-two were colored, and of these fourteen were born in the South. They have been two normal schools in Virginia, and one in North Carolina. The other schools have been chiefly in Maryland and Virginia, the people supplying the fuel, buying the books, and paying the board of the teachers. The largest number of scholars at one time was 2377, with an average attendance of 1969, about forty-four pupils to each teacher. Two of the schools of the year have been to many of the schools during the year, and report very satisfactorily. The interest of the younger children was especially remarkable. The committee naturally linger over a work so beneficial and so interesting. Virginia will do nothing for her colored schools for a year at least: and, in thirty of her hundred counties the freedmen have never had a school. Elsewhere in the State they have helped themselves so gallantly that they deserve to be helped. It is with the hope that the cause itself is irresistibly eloquent that the committee once more appeal to their friends, reminding them that the treasurer is MISS ELLEN COLLINS, 97 West Eleventh Street, New York.

FOREIGN NEWS.

On the 3d of August the French advanced from Metz to Forbach, driving back and attacked Saarbrück, a town a short distance across the frontier. The Prussians, however, had fallen back on the 2d, and the next day the French found them in force. The engagement was of no importance, as the Prussians did not seriously defend the town. The success caused great rejoicing in Paris. On his return to Metz, after the battle, the Emperor sent the following telegram to the Empress:

"Louis has received his baptism of fire. He was admirably cool and little impressed. A Prussian Frossard's command carried the heights overlooking Forbach. The Prussians made a fine defense. Prince Louis and I were in front, where the bullets fell about us like hail. Louis had a ball picked up. The soldiers wept at his tranquillity. We lost an officer and ten men."

On the 4th the first real fighting of the war took place. The largest force of Prussians, under command of the Crown Prince, advanced between Weissenburg and Wörth, and attacked Marshal MACMAHON'S army, driving the French advanced posts, and destroying the camp of the 1st division. The Prussians, after advancing, along which MACMAHON was probably posted with the main body of his army. The Prussian artillery, which was handled in the best form, were carried at the point of the bayonet after an obstinate resistance. The general in command of the French was killed, and the French encampment, one piece of artillery, and many prisoners, including many Turkos, fell into the hands of the Prussians. On the 5th the battle was also in full and apparently has also very severe.

There was fighting all along the line through the 5th and 6th, ending on the afternoon of the latter day (Sunday) in a victory for the Prussians. The French were in a critical position, promptly and entirely defeated them. Two heavy engagements have thought come to the west of Saarbrück, in which the Prussians assaulted and drove back the French under General FROSSARD. The first battle at Sarguemines, commenced on the 6th, and the Prussians under the Crown Prince of Prussia and Prince FREDERICK CHARLES on both sides were immense. The Prussian claim to have captured 4000 prisoners, 12 French cannon, and six mitrailleuses. The dispatches are contradictory and unsatisfactory. It appears that the Prussian successes have forced the French to fall back upon Chalons, and to leave Metz and Strasburg.

The following are the French official accounts of the battle:

The Major-General of the Army of Operations of the Interior:

After a series of engagements, in which the enemy brought heavy forces into the field, Marshal MACMAHON was forced to fall back from the line of the Sauer. One of General FROSSARD'S divisions was attacked by three corps of the enemy, and was forced to retire across the Sauer. The retreat was effected in order, and the division rallied at Reichshoffen.

The announcement of the defeat caused great excitement and consternation in Paris. The Emperor was not at the Ministry, declaring the city in a state of siege, in order to facilitate the organization of defense, and appealing to the patriotism and energy of the people. The Empress has issued a proclamation, in which she assures that the opening of the war has not been favorable to the French arms, and adjures all good citizens to maintain order. The Prince Imperial has retired to Biarritz.

THE LATE MR. BENJAMIN NATHAN.

BENJAMIN NATHAN.

SINCE the BURDELL tragedy in 1857, no murder has been committed which has excited so great indignation and horror as the brutal assassination of Mr. BENJAMIN NATHAN in his own house, at No. 12 West Twenty-third Street, on the morning of July 29. The deed was discovered by the sons of the murdered man, who slept in the same house, at six o'clock in the morning. The physician who was immediately summoned pronounced that Mr. NATHAN must have been dead for about three hours. It is needless here to enter upon the horrible details of a tragedy which has awakened an excitement so universal that all of our readers are familiar with the circumstances of the case. There was every evidence of a prolonged struggle between Mr. NATHAN and his murderer, or murderers. Yet no one in the house was alarmed; and the assassin, who had rifled the safe of his victim, appears to have left behind him no clew likely to lead to his detection. At least, up to the time of this writing the whole affair seems wrapped in a mystery which puzzles our sharpest detectives. It is a curious fact in connection with the murder that Mr. NATHAN, a few days only before his death, was heard to congratulate himself upon the perfect security of his place of residence.

Since the commission of the crime the wildest excitement has prevailed, and for days afterward the vicinity of the murder was thronged by thousands of citizens not less indignant than curious. Long before the hour appointed for Mr. NATHAN's obsequies, on the 1st, Twenty-third Street and Fifth Avenue were crowded, about 10,000 persons being present to witness the departure of the funeral cortége for the Cypress Hills Cemetery. The wide-spread interest manifested on this occasion was due not merely to the sympathy awakened by the fearful tragedy, but chiefly to the fact that, by this midnight murder, New York had been deprived of one of her best citizens. As the Rev. J. J. LYONS said at the funeral: "A tyrant, murdered under similar circumstances, would excite grief and pity, and how much more does this case of our friend, struck down by the hand of an assassin; a blow which brought down a doting father, a fond husband, a generous, upright man!" His name was a synonym for honor and benevolence. In private life he was kind and affectionate; in public life kind and just. His charity was catholic, limited to no creed, race, or nationality."

Mr. NATHAN was descended from one of the older Portuguese families which were driven to this country by the Inquisition. He was a native of this city, as was also his father. He was born in 1813. His mother was before her marriage Miss HENRIQUES, belonging to an ancient Knickerbocker family, and a famous belle in the early part of the century. He received a careful and thorough education, was a good classical scholar, and a connoisseur in art, his collection of pictures and articles of vertu ranking among the finest in the city. At the early age of twenty-two he was taken into partnership by his father, and was so successful in his business career that he accumulated an immense fortune. A Hebrew in race and in faith, he at an early age was called to play an important part in the direction of the affairs of the congregation to which he belonged. For nearly a third of a century he has sacredly observed the anniversary of his mother's death, and he remained in the city during the last night of his life—instead of retiring to his country residence at Morristown, New Jersey—in order to again perform the same devotional duty. He was one of the founders, and for several years the president, of the Mount Sinai Hospital. Other institutions of his Church were also the objects of his care and philanthropic charity. In personal appearance Mr. NATHAN was distinguished: his form was of the medium size; and his face, though marked with strong lines, was genial and attractive.

The coroner's inquest in the case of Mr. NATHAN's murder commenced its investigation on Thursday, August 4. No new facts have up to this time been elicited by the jury.

THE STORY OF A SHIPWRECK.

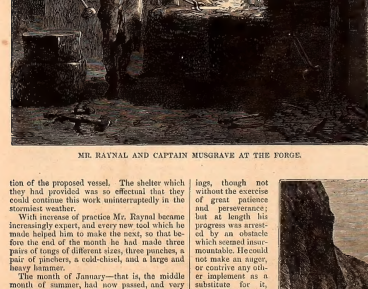
CHAPTER XI.

The Construction of the Forge.—Making a Pair of Tongs.—Mr. Raynal as a Blacksmith.—Altering the Boat to make her Sea-worthy.—Launching the Scorpion.

In the mean time Mr. Raynal and Captain Musgrave devoted themselves to the construction of the forge. They first built a rude but substantial shed to protect the blacksmith work from the weather. They covered the roof of this shed with sheets of copper from the vessel, and inclosed it sufficiently at the sides to afford the necessary protection for the workmen and the fire. When this structure was completed, they built a forge within it of flat stones and set up the bellows behind, placing it between two stout posts which they had fixed in the ground for the purpose. For an anvil they contrived to bring in from the wreck one of the masses of cast iron which had been placed in the lower hold for ballast. When all was ready they kindled a fire, and Captain Musgrave began to work the bellows. The wind came briskly and steadily through among the burning coals, producing the well-known blowing sound so characteristic of a forge in action, which both Mr. Raynal and the captain listened to with delight.

The first piece of work to be done at the forge was to make a pair of tongs. Mr. Raynal had great difficulty in accomplishing this task. He failed in many of his attempts, but by patience and perseverance he finally succeeded. He was then all ready to begin his work of making the necessary tools and implements for the construction of the proposed vessel. The shelter which they had provided was so effectual that they could continue this work uninterruptedly in the stormiest weather.

REBUILDING THE BOAT.



MR. RAYNAL AND CAPTAIN MUSGRAVE AT THE FORGE.

With increase of practice Mr. Raynal became increasingly expert, and every new tool which he made helped him to make the next, so that before the end of the month he had made three pairs of tongs of different sizes, three punches, a pair of pinchers, a cold-chisel, and a large and heavy hammer.

The month of January—that is, the middle month of summer, had now passed, and very little but the most preliminary work had been done. Still Mr. Raynal was now beginning to acquire so much skill as a blacksmith, and the facility afforded by his increasing supply of tools aided him so much, that he accomplished more during the first week in February than he had done during the whole month preceding. He procured his materials, in the way of iron and steel, for all this work, from the wreck of the vessel, partly from the structure of the vessel itself, and partly from implements of various kinds found on board, which were of no service to them in their actual forms, but which could be made to furnish supplies of iron and steel. For example, from the pickaxes which had been put on board when the vessel sailed to be employed in mining operations, and which were pointed with steel, he made chisels and gouges. The blade of a shovel furnished him with a steel plate, out of which he manufactured a very good plane iron, and also the material for forming the cutting edges of an axe and two hatchets. He made a saw plate from an iron hoop taken from one of the casks intended to contain seal oil. He first straightened the hoop and then cut out the teeth with a cold-chisel, and lastly stretched the saw plate thus made in a wooden frame.

He succeeded quite well in all these undertakings, though not without the exercise of great patience and perseverance; but at length his progress was arrested by an obstacle which seemed insurmountable. He could not make an auger, or contrive any other implement as a substitute for it, which could be employed to bore a hole. The difficulty in the case of the auger was to make the gimlet-like point which, by the action of its screw, draws the cutting part of the auger forward into the wood as the tool is turned. He spent two days in trying to devise some means of accomplishing this object, but in vain. At last, weary of his repeated efforts, and disheartened by his failure, he began to feel discouraged about the whole plan, and to inquire whether, after all, he had not engaged in a hopeless undertaking. After reflecting upon the subject for some time with much anxiety, he concluded to bring the whole question again before his companions, that they might consider it anew, and also that he might propose to them certain modifications of the plan which he had in mind.

In accordance with this conclusion, he made a statement to this effect. He said that, although they had accomplished as much, perhaps, during the six weeks which they had devoted to this labor as they ought to expect, he confessed that, although he had himself proposed the plan, and it was in accordance with his wishes that they had consented to engage in the undertaking, he found that the difficulties were very great, and the time which would be required, even if they were ultimately successful, would be longer than he had at first supposed. A vessel large enough to convey such a number of persons, with the necessary provision of food and of water, ought to be certainly not less than of ten or fifteen tons burden; and when he considered the quantity of wood which would be required, and the number of nails and of bolts, the other fixtures and appointments that would be necessary, all of which they would have to prepare themselves with the comparatively few facilities and resources at their command, he began to feel that they had undertaken a great work. They could not hope, he said, to complete it in less than one or two years.

Still, if they thought it best to persevere, he was ready to go on with the work as long as any hope remained of its final accomplishment. But that, if they thought that the task which they had undertaken was too great for them, there was another plan which he had to propose. This new plan was that, instead of attempting to build a new vessel, they should strengthen and enlarge the boat, so as, if possible, to make it sea-worthy. They could put on an extra keel, lengthen her, build up her sides, so as to give her the necessary capacity, and make a deck. In this way he thought they might make her large and strong enough to carry perhaps three of their number. She would not be large enough to take all of them, and this was the great objection to the plan, since two of them, at least, must be left behind. But then it was to be considered that the chances of the two who were left would be as good, or nearly as good, as those who went away; for these, in attempting to make such a voyage in so frail a craft, would expose themselves to the most imminent danger; and, even if they succeeded in reaching a port, those who were left would share the benefit of their success in having succor immediately sent to them.

The work of altering the boat in the manner thus described he thought might be done in three or four months, while the building of the larger vessel anew would require perhaps two years.

All the party, except Harry, at once evinced a disposition to approve of this new plan, not as the most desirable, but as the most practicable. Harry considered it entirely chimerical. If they were to alter the boat, however, in the manner proposed, there would be no difficulty, he said, so far as he was concerned, in determining who should be left behind, for he, for one, would never consent to put to sea in such a craft. He should infinitely prefer to be left behind.

This view of the case on the part of Harry rather helped than hindered the decision, for it tended to relieve them of what might otherwise have been a very serious difficulty—namely, that of determining who should be left behind. So it was finally decided to give up the original design of building a vessel anew, and to see, instead, what they could do in the way of enlarging and strengthening the boat.

They all at once set themselves at work upon the new plan. While George and Harry continued in charge of the duty of procuring and pre-of food, and attending to all the interior affairs of the cabin, and Aleck went on with a work of making charcoal, Mr. Raynal and the captain commenced operations upon the boat. They first selected a convenient place upon the shore, where the ground sloped gently toward the water, and there laid a platform of timber for the "ways." They then put the new keel upon the boat. This keel was made of a thick plank obtained from the wreck, and was firmly secured by iron bolts. They then placed the boat upon the ways with the bow toward the water, supporting it in a horizontal position by blocks increasing in thickness down the incline. They also put up braces on each side, to secure it in its position.

They then went to work very industriously and perseveringly to make the necessary alterations. It was now March — the commencement with them of the fall of the year—and they were very desirous of getting the boat completed so as to set sail before the winter should set in. So they commenced their work every morning as soon as it was light enough to see, and continued it, with the exception of a short respite for dinner, until dark. The evenings they spent in the blacksmith's shop, fabricating the necessary irons. They found some of the requisite additions in the length of the boat—securing the new part to the old by strong iron bands. They put in some four new ribs long enough to rise two feet above the others, and also a new stem-post, which left was secured by similar bands of iron extending from top, where they came together, by a ring to secure the end of the bowsprit.

The frame thus constructed was finished at the end of the first week in March. The next thing to be done was to make and put on the planking.

It was not possible to procure materials from the wreck for this work, so they went into the woods. It was very difficult to find straight trees soon enough for the right size for their purpose, but they gradually procured a supply. These they first squared, and then, with their white lead, sawed them into planks, or rather boards, about an inch thick and five inches wide. They spent the evenings in making planks. Before nailing these boards on it was necessary to steam them, in order that they might be bent so as to be fitted to their places. This they did by inclosing them in a rank together with a bottle of boiling water, which, as time went on, rendered them sufficiently manageable. They were aided in this operation by the fact that the wood was green, and by the mere heating of it produced in some measure the same effect as the steaming of wood that was seasoned.

The labor of making these planks, and fitting them to their places, including the manufacture of the nails, was so great that two months and a half were expended in accomplishing it. This was not until the middle of June—which was their December—that the "carpenter work" of the hull was completed. Then followed the task of constructing a rudder, and of forging the iron-work necessary for supporting it. At the same time also the tools necessary for opening the seams and driving the oakum in. Instead of pitch they made a kind of resin of lime and seal oil, with which they coated the whole outside surface of the hull, after the oakum was driven in. They found among the spars of the wreck timber for a mast and bowsprit, and also, from what remained of her rigging, the materials for making a set of new sails. Mr. Raynal also recollected having seen at one time a large quantity of fragments of the wreck which were strewn along the shore. This he looked up and put in order, and found that it would probably answer their purpose well in case of rough weather and great laboring of their little vessel, while it would be less result in admitting a good deal of water through the imperfect joints of the outside planking and of the deck.

As they knew that it would be necessary for them to be at sea nearly all the time, especially in bad weather, they cut three scuttles in the deck, in a line with each other, fore and aft—one for each of them—so that they might sit upon the margin of the openings and have their feet in the hold below. All around these openings they nailed seal-skins, which they could draw up over them when they were seated there, supporting the upper part by straps over their shoulders, but leaving their arms free for such management of the sails and rigging as was practicable from those positions. There was very little, in fact, that was not practicable; for, as the boat was only about six feet wide, they could easily reach to each side from their stations in the centre.

Still, as they knew that they would often be required to leave these places of refuge, they set up posts all around the outside of the deck, and connected them with a stout railing, in the way of bulwarks, in order that they might have something to cling to for support in case of boisterous weather.

For a supply of water they cut a cask in two and fitted a cover over the open part, making it as nearly as possible water-tight. They then made a small opening in the middle of this cover just sufficient to admit a tin cup and the hand, and rhoused this opening with a lid working on leather hinges.

The compass, which they had saved from the ship, they secured in its proper place at the helm.

These things being all the arranged, the boat was ready for the launching. It was seventeen feet long, six feet wide, and a little more than three feet deep. They calculated that its burden was about two and one-half tons.

To prepare for the launching they laid, at low tide, a platform extending down from the bows to where, at high tide, the water would be deep enough to float the boat. They made this platform by first laying short transverse logs, as sleepers, at proper distances apart, securing the ends to posts set deep in the gravel, and then laying a flooring of boards over the sleepers. Every thing was ready for the launching on the 12th of July. On that day, when the tide was up, they piled up the boat with long levers so as to take out the blocks from under her, and, after the blocks were removed, let her down upon the ways. Next day she slid into the water easily and partly by the prying and pushing and guiding of the men, she was slowly urged down the platform until, to the great satisfaction and joy of her builders, she was fairly afloat. They named her the Arrow.

A FRIEND IN NEED.

"IF I wasn't so infernally considerate of the feelings of others, I wouldn't be in this scrape, you know," said Fred Bellamy to Jack Hawkins's face was most doleful.

"How do you make that out?" asked Ralph Avery.

"Why, when I saw how poor little Annie Bush loved me, and how I pitied her, and all the time, of course I had to ask her—it was just the time and place for such a scene, down in the woods by the brook, in the cool of the afternoon —and, of course, she said yes."

"And you, you villain, you married her to say so."

"No, I didn't. There's where you are mistaken. I never was so happy in my life as when she put her little hand in mine, blushing like a rose, and whispered—you know what."

"Why couldn't you tell well enough alone, then?"

"That's just it. Why couldn't I? It's because I'm so confoundedly accommodating and considerate, I tell you—nothing else. I had been flirting a little with Annie, just to show she was bound to lead me on, and I couldn't bear to disappoint her. So I proposed, and I'll be hanged if she hasn't gone and taken me at my word, and, of course, I had to be considerate in my turn know of that? Has the wretch been telling you, after cautioning me?"

"There! I was a blunderer!" exclaimed Ralph. "I have ruined him in your estimation."

"His uncle—"

"Bother his uncle! That's all a fiction."

"You amaze me.

"Yes, and I must tell the whole story now. I wouldn't, if I did not think so much of you. But you shall not be the victim of his folly any longer. The truth is, he is rather a wild young fellow, and not half good enough for you. He wanted me to help him out of a scrape. He engaged himself both to you and Annie Bush."

"What are you telling me?"

"The truth. When I came here he confessed all to me, and induced me to pretend to be a spy acting on behalf of his fictitious uncle. He doubtless told you about it, and repeated the same story to Annie Bush. This was to keep the matter quiet, so that he could have time to devise some means of getting out of the scrape.

"The wicked fellow! It would serve him right for both of us to cut him altogether."

"Oh no! Fred is a good-hearted fellow, more indiscreet than wicked."

"Indiscreet! I should think so. But," she added, laughing, "it was rather an awkward position for him. I don't envy his state of mind. He ought to be punished, though."

"So he had. I wonder how it could be done?"

"Can't you think of any way?"

"I don't know," said Ralph.

"Think," said Mrs. Delorme. "Oh, I have it! Suppose somebody—you, for instance—should marry one of his sweet-hearts—not Annie!" Somehow she was utterly very fond him just then, and her hand was where he could conveniently reach it. He grasped it suddenly, and a new light came into his eyes, as he burst out:

"Oh, Mrs. Delorme! oh, Lucretia! if you only would! What a glorious plan that would be! Give yourself to me, and, with all my roughness, I think I could cure for you lovingly. For I love you with all my strength. Not alone to punish him, but to fill the great yearning of my soul. Oh, say that you will be mine!"

His arm was around her by this time, and, as she did not resist him, he drew her closer to his with a tight embrace, and kissed her ripe lips over and over again. Then he exclaimed, "Say yes, darling, that I may be assured of this great happiness!"

She uttered the desired syllable softly, for which she was rewarded with another ebullition of Ralph's pent-up feelings.

"Then," he said, pushing him gently away, "That will do now. What are you going to tell Fred?"

"The exact truth. He wanted me to help him out of his scrape, and I've done it in a manner that will slightly astonish him, I imagine."

Ralph found Fred looking rather gloomy that evening.

"Cheer up, old boy" he cried. "I've fixed it all right for you."

"You have?"

"Yes. Congratulate me," holding out his hand.

"What do you mean?"

"Congratulate me, I say!" and he seized Fred's hand and shook it violently.

"I don't understand."

"You'll have no more trouble with the widow."

"How—why?"

"I'm going to marry her myself."

"The devil!"

"Congratulate me, I say, and tell me you wish me joy. Come!"

"But what do you mean? Are you in earnest?"

"I never was more so. Now go and marry sweet little Annie Bush."

"Ralph," said Fred, solemnly, "I always thought you were my friend."

"I hope I am."

"Then why have you played me false in this way?"

"Played you false! What do you mean, you villain? Didn't you want me to help you out of your scrape? And haven't I done it, and done it well?"

Fred was silent, and pondered gloomily. "I'm disappointed in the widow," he muttered.

"Now don't make a fool of yourself any longer," exclaimed Ralph, impatiently. "Act like a sensible man, if you are capable of it. You can't marry them both, and you know you love Annie."

Fred was again silent, but this time a smile gradually crept over his features. "Ralph, you are a brick," he at length said. "Certainly I'll congratulate you, and heartily too." He jumped up and seized Ralph's hand. "I wish you the greatest joy that this earth affords."

"My dear Annie, there is no longer any necessity for concealing our engagement."

"Oh, I'm so glad! But your uncle?"

"Oh, he has relented."

"How good of him!"

"That is, I don't believe he ever would have raised any serious objection."

"Ah! And are we to see him?"

"In fact, Annie, I have to own that—"

Annie looked up in mute amazement.

"Now don't be angry, Annie, dear. There were other reasons. I have won another—there is, I was hampered by serious embarrassments that rendered it necessary to—ah—keep certain parties concluded—conciliated—that's it. But it is all past now, and you wouldn't care to listen to particulars, so we'll say nothing about it."

"You don't love any body else, do you, Fred?" with a look of pitiful appealfulness.

"No, indeed, my little rose-bud. You alone fill my heart. You are the light of my existence. My whole love shall always be given to you."

She nestled her arm more closely within his as they walked along under the spreading elms.

Just then they met Ralph Avery and Mrs. Delorme. Fred turned all colors, and his mind was in a perfect frenzy in his efforts to invent some excuse for turning back. Before he could collect himself, however, the couples met.

Mrs. Delorme's face was calm, happy, and serene, though she darted a significant look at Fred. The latter was afterward heard to declare that that moment was the most uncomfortable one he ever passed in his whole life. Ralph enjoyed the scene hugely, and was also heard to express himself in terms of what was passing in the minds of the other three.

But what mattered it? Fred's trouble was over, Ralph was no longer in a bachelor, and were supremely happy, and—isn't that enough?

THE MITRAILLEUR.

THE system in use in the French army is kept a secret, as therefore is that of Christophe and Montigny, which is adopted at Berlin, Vienna, and Riga, and in Belgium.

The mitrailleur of Messrs. Christophe and Montigny is the result of an ingenious breechloading device combined with a number of guns united. The specimen shown in our engravings is a mitrailleur of 37 guns, weighing 1,800 lbs. in minute. It has the appearance of a small field-gun, except that the part simulating the cylindrical piece holds thirty-seven rifled barrels of cast steel, of a calibre of from ten to fourteen millimeters or eleven to fifteen in juxtaposition, as to form a fasces, and enveloped in a wrought-iron cylinder. On the back and in the prolongation of the cylinder are placed as it will appear, recesses down the cartridges into the chamber of the guns, and, at the same time, drives the percussion-primer against the fulminate. The guns are then only necessary to raise the detent lever, to pull laterally and vertically the crank of the battery, to discharge all the guns singly or simultaneously.

The discharged plate is instantly removed by means of the rear lever, which is raised, and replaced by a second charged plate, which the lever in falling shoves into the gun.

The mitrailleur rests, at its centre of gravity, on a pivot, which moves in a revolving rest fixed on the carriage; so that a semicircular rotatory movement to the right or the left of the axis of the battery, to discharge all the guns singly or simultaneously.

The mitrailleur rests, at its centre of gravity, on a pivot, which moves in a revolving rest fixed on the carriage; so that a semicircular rotatory movement to the right or the left of the axis of the battery, to discharge all the guns singly or simultaneously.

The mitrailleur is actuated by the movement of a crank, which, in firing, produces the effect of a raking fire. A graduated fixed sight permits of its firing at distances exceeding 1,000 meters, or a little over 1640 yards. Lastly, two counter-plates, one at the other, form the cartridge-box, simplifying cleaning, and remounting the piece, etc.

The experiments that have been made at Brunswick, Leipic, England, St. Petersburg, Vienna, Dresden, and Berlin, have given such satisfactory results that Messrs. Christophe and Montigny for both field and garrison, has been adopted almost every where, not only in the countries which we have just named, but in Turkey, which has just been received for them from China. The reports of foreign officers testify that the mechanism of the Christophe-Montigny gun is a master-piece of simplicity and precision.

The absolute average variation of a volley of 37 balls is 1.28 in 700, .77 in 450, and so on. At the distance of 200 meters an 18-pounder ball gets literally cut to pieces; and the penetrating force at 600 meters, through pieces of wood, is about 25 centimeters, or a little over 9 inches.

The projectile weighs 37 grammes, or a little over an ounce. The charge of powder is from 6 to 8 grammes. The last amount is that considered by the inventors.

The mitrailleur of 37 guns weighs 180 kilogrammes, or 400 pounds, without the carriage, and can be worked by two men. It was found, however, at Vienna, in December, 1869, that to obtain the most rapid firing, or 481 balls per minute, five men were necessary to work the piece.

The front carriage contains from 48 to 56 boxes for loading, and the two caisson hold 16 breechplates furnished with cartridges. The projectile is, therefore, provided with 2368 cartridges; and a battery of 5 mitrailleurs can hurl on an attacking column 2,400 effective projectiles per minute.

In the recent engagement at Saarbrück the mitrailleur was found to be a most effective weapon. But the Prussians claim that they have produced a weapon of the same character which is as much superior to the mitrailleur as they believe the needle-gun to be to the chassepot.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

In the early founders of a city could, with prophetic eye, look forward a century or so, what a blessing would it be to their posterity! If the veterans of Jackson with memories of the battle of the Yazoo City had understood the commercial advantages of the location, and what a great metropolis was to grow out of small beginnings, how differently would they have laid their plans! Or if, in more recent times, a wiser forethought had preserved the ruins of the city, what benefits would have rested, like a benediction, upon us! Adobe California and Pacific Bars are only small misery acres of public parks and squares in New York. What are these among so many? Where, in many of the small parks have been so utterly neglected that they are any thing but attractive. This great and crowded population should have more breathing-places to preserve both physical and moral health. It is gratifying to know that the new Department of Public Works have already commenced to renovate existing public squares, and to make them beautiful and attractive resorts, and even propose to establish new ones. What a blessing will the proposed park at the Five Points be to that locality! A wooded grove, inclosed by an iron railing, will be a delightful rest and retreat in that wilderness of brick and mortar. Nay, more. An attractive park at the Five Points, or in any wretched quarter of our city, will exert a positive moral influence, and prove itself to be a valuable investment even to the people. Let us, then, gladly hail every addition and improvement in this department. Before the close of the present the Battery will be laid out in large grass-plots and tastefully ornamented; important improvements are projected for Washington Park; and to the lower part of the city several open tracts of land are to be inclosed and beautified for the good of the public.

English papers state that Mark Lemon's notes on the origin and history of Punch have been found among his papers, and are to be published.

The saddest episode of the trip of the Dauntless occurred on the third morning of the voyage. Wallie engaged in fueling the flying fish, two men, Charles Scott and Albert Sweeney, were up in the bows, a heavy gale prevailing at the time. Buoys were thrown to them, and all provided with all possible dispatch, but the search for the missing men, though protracted, for hours, proved fruitless. Both were good seamen, and was undoubtedly hurt in falling. Demar was not present. He was—as was ascertained from letters in his chest—a German baron abandoned by his family. His sister is the wife of a colonel in the army of the Grand Duke of Baden-Baden. The hours lost in searching for the missing men, and the depression of spirits in consequence of the disaster, were, perhaps, the cause of the Dauntless arriving here second in the race.

A biography of Charles Dickens has just been published in London, and has been reprinted by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, which is said to be the best which has appeared. The compiler, in addition to the usual means of acquiring information, has received assistance from many of the friends whom most intimately knew, but the contents of the work are thoroughly reliable. The career of Dickens, from the first publication of the "Pickwick Papers," in 1836, to his latest Christmas story, is traced with much great fidelity, and the various incidents of his life are eloquently dilated upon. The volume contains numerous illustrations, among which are five portraits of Dickens taken at different periods of his life.

Since the first indications of war with Prussia the French Government has repeatedly taken a new breechloading rifle. All symptoms of gout, with which he has been tormented for many years, have entirely disappeared, and he is all animation and vivacity.

The best mode of traveling, remarks one who appears to know, is on foot or in the saddle; next in an easy carriage; then by railway, and almost any mode of traveling by water, is, in general, useful; but it would be a serious punishment to any one to be sent to strike an invalid to seek for health in a railroad car.

President Grant, for good reasons of his own, declined to attend the races at Long Branch. People called to attract the races at Long Branch. People called to attract the races at Long Branch. People called to attract

OLD TREASURES.—[SEE PAGE 540.]

LONG AGO.

O run days of long ago!
In summer days of long ago
Still the June promise breaks out in a glow
Of intense blue sky; and sweet runs bloom,
And woodlands are green with a golden flush,
And along the meadows the mowers go;
But o'ercrowning it all a shadow lies—
Is it from the sun, or over our eyes?
No shadows rested there long ago!

O the flowers of long ago!
The primrose banks of long ago!
The woodbine climbers in every hedgerow;
The cowslip fields with their harvest-like gleam,
The fragrant wild pinetop beside each stream—
The ponds with gay lily-buds all aglow.
The daisies—all daisies were sweet to my mind
Like the pink-edged daisies we used to find
In the May-time meadows long ago!

O the friends of long ago!
The parted friends of long ago
Alas that we ever could let them go!
We have wish to be under friends since then—
Strong-hearted women, true and steadfast men;
We've tried them, proved them, and found them so;
But
We miss—if the truth we dare confess—
The trust and the loving unselfishness
Of the dear old friends of long ago!

O the love of long ago!
The fond, every love of long ago!
It was not of foolishness now we knew;
It made no vows, it was speechless
Of opening doors and of listening ears
For the voice and the thinkin had thus to grow.
With longer and fuller love now we're filled
Yet an angel glanteth the mem'ry still
Of our first young love-time, long ago!

O the hopes of long ago!
The heavy, vain hopes of long ago!
The passionate longings for want and woe
That came into earth God send us to help!
We meant to stand ever firm to the right,
That the world through us should be better grow.
We felt strong as young giants in our might;
But woe of us all to have left out the fight,
And kept to the faith of long ago!

O the sunny long ago!
The cardinal sins long ago!
Sorrow, sorrow, in Time's never-ceasing flow,
As the backward glance through the gathering haze
Of dreary years, and still deeper days,
To the friends, the hopes, and the lilies' glow;
And we utter cry of longing and woe
For the life that we never can live again,
That died in our spring-time long ago!

Yearning so for long ago,
Wailing so for long ago,
A hope arises that softens the woe—
Of a land where all things will ripen youth,
And wear the white robes of unwarring truth;
And walk in the fields where the asphodel grow,
And meet a Friend who has ever been true,
And look on a Son whom no sinfulness pursues,
And never more wish for time long ago!

CHAPTER VII.

YORKE REPORTS PROGRESS.

I TRUST it will not be imagined, and far less hoped for, by any reader of this sober narrative, that the physician's concluded the last chapter implies that he or she is about to be introduced to bad company. The fair sex will not be without their associations in our story, and that from soon; but they will not be such as blushed unseen (if blushed at all) in the bowers at Crompton. Mr. Ryll's suggestion, "Let us join the ladies," was only an elegant way he had, and which was well understood by his audience, of proposing an adjournment to the billiard-room. If that worthy old gentleman could be said to have had any source of income whatever, it was the billiard-table; and hence it was that he was always ready to proceed thither. Nor had he boasted without reason, a while ago, of his powers of self-denial; for he would often forego a glass of generous wine (when he felt that he had had enough), in order to keep his hand steady for the game of pool, which invariably took place at Crompton after dinner. His extreme obesity, though it militated with him of some advantages in the way of "reach," was, upon the whole, a benefit to him. His antagonists lost the sense of his superiority at skill in their contempt of his ridiculous and constrained postures in which he was compelled to place himself, and he was well content to see them laugh and leer. He was a first-rate player could have held his own among that company, whose intelligence was much affected to this particular pursuit for most of their natural lives; and even "Tom Ryll," as they called him behind his supplement his deficiencies by means to make success secure. His liveliest allies, his bitterest foes, were all reserved for these occasions, so that mirth or anger was forever unstringing the nerves of his competitors, and diminishing their chance of skill. It was difficult to smirting the nerves of Parson Whymper, who ran very close to him in point of promises divided the spoil with him; but on the present occasion he had a wordy weapon to baffle even that foe. His consistent and unbroken opposition to the latter's supposed reversionary interest in the living at Crompton, the incumbrance of it was ancient and infirm, and which was in the Squire's gift. This piece of preferment was the object of his physician's dearest hopes, and on that subject he would have chosen to jest upon, especially in the presence of its patron.

"Is he to have it, Squire, or is he not?" would be Tub Ryll's serious inquiry, just as it was the parson's turn to drive home, or, "Is it to be for the vicar elect?"—observations which seldom failed to cost that expectant divine a sovereign, for the play at the Hall table, although not so high as was going on in the Library with those who patronized cards, was for considerable stakes. Carew, who enjoyed, above all things, this embarrassing pleasantry, would return an ambiguous reply, so that the problem remained without a solution. But when the disgusted chaplain at last threw up his cue, in a most unusual fit of dudgeon, the Squire put the question to the company, as a case for cheerful preferment of which he was unwilling to take the sole responsibility. "The same," he said, "which had been offered to him for the next presentation would exactly defray the cost of his second pack of hounds, which his chaplain himself had advised him to put down; so the point to be considered—"

"The hounds, the hounds!" broke in this impatient audience, amidst roars of laughter. And nobody knew better than Parson Whymper himself that this verdict would be more final than that of most other ecclesiastical synods, and that he had lost his preferment. It was Carew's humor to take jest for earnest (as it was to turn into ridicule what was serious), and the opinion of the world was pledged to decisions to which nobody else would have attached the slightest weight. It pleased him to feel that he had made a new outlaw, or perhaps it was a part of the savage moderation which he affected to be a virtue.

Ryam Kyll felt a genuine regret that he had pushed matters so far, though Whymper himself was to blame for having shown too much, and thereby precipitated the catastrophe. But he did not play the less skillfully on that account, and, moreover, had no rival to divide the pool with him.

"I would give five pounds if somebody would beat him," muttered the discontented parson within a hearing of Yorke, who was standing aloof with his cigar watching the game.

"I think I could," said the young man, quietly, "if I had five pounds."

As the pool was two pounds, and the lives were one, this was exactly the amount of money in the parson's purse, and which want of the necessary funds had alone prevented the young man from incurring.

"Here is a fiver," replied the parson, softly.

"But I really have no money," remonstrated Yorke, though his face for a moment, a moment with delight (for he was a gambler to the core), "nor any prospect of having."

"Yes, yes; you have expectations enough," answered the other, hurriedly. "You may give me that bond of yours—who knows? You can't sell a bull, man—take a bull."

When the game commenced, the young landscape-painter, who had spent at least as much of his short life at those boards of green cloth called public tables, as he had in the verdant haze of nature, made one of the combatants, and not a little astonished them by his performance. He had the eye of a hawk, with the lightness of a young panther; and his prudence during the first debutant days served to the steadiness of hand. Mr. Theodore Fane had the misfortune to be his immediate predecessor, and was "potted" at long distances.

"By Jove!" exclaimed he, sulkily, upon losing his last ball by a double, "you must have lived by your wits, young gentleman, to have learned to play pool like that."

"I have," returned Yorke, without moving a muscle, and preparing to strike again. "You will soon be able to buy a bull, if you stick to this game—but your end will not be protracted."

"You will starve to death with considerable rapidity."

"My dear Mr. Yorke," said Ryam Kyll, approachingly, "I assure you we shall really be—I can't afford to let you win my sovereigns; I like you, but I must kill you off, I see."

"Indeed!" said Yorke.

"Unless what?" inquired Ryll, as he made his stroke at a difficult ball, and made it quite safe and grazed it with his own, which, gliding off another ball, found its way into a pocket. "For mercy, he had nearly allowed himself to be "put on" his aim.

"Unless you commit suicide," replied the young fellow, smiling.

"I was about to warn you of the danger of that kiss.

"I have never seen a highway robber, young Sir," said the annoyed old gentleman.

"Nor I, Tom," returned Yorke, "for I take my money and your life."

The young fellow repaid his loan that night, besides pocketing a dozen sovereigns of the host's own pocket; and there was no more talk of that investment.

Carew was delighted with his son's skill, though his wit was somewhat wasted on him. "Why the deuce don't you play for a fiver a game?" said he, when the party broke up to adjourn to the hazard-table. "I suppose it was your confounded cunning (and here he gave a grave dark, as though with some recollection of his own gain), "to make them think you a muff before you pitted yourself against them—did you? How like, how like!"

"I had no motive," said Parson Whymper lent me some."

"Eh, Dick, that is it—was it?" said the Squire.

"Well, well, that was not your fault, lad, nor shall it be mine—here, catch," and out of his breeches-pocket he took a fiver and tossed it, and flung them at him; then suddenly turned round to Yorke, who was grounded like a motherseed excretion at his own folly.

Yorke did not risk this unexpected treasure on the chance of his winning it back, but left the room. It was a dainty chamber, as we have said, and offered a most delightful contrast to his late sleeping-room in the keeper's lodge. He opened the door of communication by which the Squire had referred, and found himself in a sort of boudoir, in which, as in his own room, a good fire was burning. By the lover of art-furniture, this latter apartment would have been pronounced a perfect gem. Here also every article was of ebony, and flushed back the blaze from the red coals like dusky mirrors. Yorke felt the resemblance—desired it, even—and a genius soul in peril sees in his mind's eye, and promises to his saint—and looked around him with curiosity. Like the little Marchioness of Mr. Richard Swiveller, he had never seen such things, "except in shops;" or rather, he had seen single specimens of such exposed in windows of great furniture warehouses, rather as a wonder and a show than with any hope to tempt a purchaser. On one hand stood an ebony cabinet, elaborately carved with fruit and flowers—it was divided into three parts, and their shut doors faced with plate-glass gave it the appearance of a tripartite altar with its sacred fire kindled. A casket almost as large glowed close beside it, covered with pictures and landscapes, but with shining locks and hinges, as he afterward discovered, of silver. A book-case filled with some precious wood was filled with volumes bound in scarlet—all French novels, superbly if not richly bound, and printed on fine paper. The article which astonished the new tenant of this chamber was the quiet exercitone that occupied its centre, with every thing set out for ornament or use that is seen on a lady's writing-table. It was suspended by a little nick-sacks as he there beheld could be intended for male use, and still more for such purposes as were Squire's guests. Did this chamber and its neighbor apartment usually own a female proprietress? and if so, why was it placed there? This idea by no means alarmed the young landscape-painter, who had no more sensitive bonds, nor dislike to adventure in gallantry, than Gil Blas de Santillana. He sat down at the secritoire, and, taking up a gilt pen with a ridiculous silk tassel, began a letter to the same person to whom that day he had already dispatched a missive; but this time it was not to tell of the day of brilliant dice and illuminated addresses had not as yet set in, so he wrote in the dark. It was a communication of a cold free hand, the word Crompton! and put a note of intimation after it. Had you seen his face as he did so, you would have said it was a note of triumph.

"My dear Mother,—Veni, vidi, vici—I have come, I have seen him, and I am at all events victorious. The perilous moment was when I told him who I was. He said he was half disposed to set his bull-dog at me, but he has not got a terrier, he at once had the exchange my bachelor's quarters for the two chambers I am now in, and which are exactly the one of the Arabian Nights. I have never seen any thing like them; the furniture of both is of the same, but the various part of the affair is that they are evidently designed for a lady. Imagine your friend lying under a coverlet of the real Brussels lace. Every thing in the house, however, is magnificent, or was so once, before the servants commenced revel. Such quiet ones as I have witnessed to-night would seem incredible. If I wrote the Arabian Nights' Entertainment of old Hogarth will supply you with the dramatis personæ; but the splendor of the surroundings completely heightened the effect of all. Carew and his friends might have sat for Alnaschar and his rich carousing amidst the wreck of the art treasures of Rome. Nothing that he has affords him any satisfaction; though, if it is a great one, Squire Carew's but ever to be devises a momentary pleasure from its willful damage. This man and one other are the only friends I possess on earth about Carew; but even they have no influence with him that can be depended on. If matters are not settled speedily—indeed, I might consider myself deceased. You were right there, I own; but you must needs allow that I understand this adventure completely to your advice I have effected something. The Squire is evidently speculating upon my future fortunes, and he knows his patron better than my body; at all events, if I am turned out of house to-morrow (which I will not agree to on the cards), I shall have three hundred pounds in my pocket, which seems to me a fortune. Then drew me in notes, exactly as you throw a chicken-bone to Tansky as he sits on his hind-legs, though I dare say he is not. Yet, then, I do assure you the immediate cause of my being invited hither was as follows: the writer described his exploit with the stags]. This, with our match at fisticuffs by moonlight, had greatly inclined Carew to favor me. When the disclosure of my identity was made, I thought for a moment all my pains were lost. He resented the intrusion exceedingly; but as he had himself invited me to be his guest; and he holds his word as good as his bond—and you know, for them, I do assure you me, it will soon be held something better, for even his vast estate is crumbling away, acre by acre, beneath the feet of his expeditious creditors to bear. There must be much, however, at this rate, to be picked up among the débris of such a fortune.

"I am aware that it is in the best degree improbable that I shall ever be persuaded to make a will in my body's favor at present. He imagines, I think, that he can live as long as I, and his sole enjoyment—it almost might be so, for all he sees to the contrary—and never dreams that he will die. But it is quite certain that he will die early; and more than likely that he will come to grief, when he has lost his nerve, in one or other of the mad exploits which he will be too proud to discontinue. Then will your Richard become the most wondrous and painstaking of nurses that ever honored crack-brained patient. But there! I have not the slightest intention of what is to happen, and this is but a specimen. Who can tell? I may be heir of Crompton yet, or I may come back to you or nowhere like a bad penny, and with what the vulgar describe as a flea in my ear.

"It will not surprise you to learn that you are personally held in great disfavor here, though the chaplain (who has heard all from the Squire's lips) speaks of you with due respect. The last thing that is desired is your return, and even the return of its lawful mistress. Carew himself in very bitter against you, which is doubtless owing to the good offices of grandmamma. The clock has just struck four, which bids me close this letter, though of all the Squire's guests, to judge by the wrangling that is going on in the Library below stairs, the first to retire will be your affectionate son,

"Richard Yorke.

"P.S.—I forgot to say that Carew made the most pointed inquiries as to whether I had any other profession than that of landscape-painting. Would it not be strangely comical if he should bestir himself to get me some Civil appointment! Parson fancies that he must have been thinking of doing so, from some scraps of talk I heard him let fall at dinner. Curiously enough, by-the-by, who should have been sitting at his right-hand, but Frederick Chandos, Jack's brother! 'Good Heaven!' (you will say,) 'suppose it had been Jack himself;' however, it was not."

CHAPTER VIII.

HOW BENEDICT BECAME A BACHELOR.

NOTWITHSTANDING the late hour at which Yorke had to his own sumptuous couch, he was up the next morning betimes. He was restless, and eager to explore the splendors of the house, that had been so nearly his inheritance, for it was not without a stubborn contest that the law had deprived him of what he still believed to be his rights. Nor had Crompton, in his eyes (as we have hinted), only the interest of Might-have-been; it had that of Might-be also. If not absolutely sanguine, he was certainly far from hopeless of his success, having him that great enemy, at all events, while the opportunity was afforded him, which he well knew might be lost for ever by his own imprudence, or through the caprice of another, he resolved not to neglect it. It was broad daylight, yet not a soul was stirring in all the stately places; nothing but the echo of his own footsteps, and the trod the corridors, entered the great Picture-gallery, now his attentive ear. The collection of old masters at Crompton was varied and valuable, he could have spent hours among them with infinite pleasure, if the intoxicating thought that they all might be one day his own, had not been present to mar their charms. He regarded them less as an admiring disciple, or a connoisseur, than as an acquaintance. The homely life-scenes of Jan Steen, the saintly creations of Paul Veronese, the warmth of Rubens' art, and the sensitiveness of Vandyke's, were all possessed by one standard—that of price. The portraits of this latter master alone, thought he, "represent no moderate fortune."

When his eye strayed to the tall windows, and he looked on the green sward across which he had in mad Carew a nominal master, the beauty of dale and woodland seemed to him not at all a "wonder now," sighed he, "how much of this is dipped?" It was a good sign, he thought, that in one room he found a sketch-book containing not less than forty antique cameos; for, if the pressure of pecuniary difficulty had really begun to be severe, the Squire would have parted with what he could, possessed by one standard—that of price. The contents of this sketch-book, thought he, "represent no moderate fortune."

The contents of this sketch-book, thought he, "represent no moderate fortune."

How high and fresh it was! How much there was of bracing enjoyment in the wholesome gayety, in the mere breath of it; how much of invigorating delight in the mere sight of the glittering turf, the bended trees, to which the boarfrost had lent its jewels! But such cheap luxuries are not always to be enjoyed, and the sleeping off their debauch of the past night during the brightest hours of the day they are lost to, says the sage thcse who rise early in the morning, to follow the strong drink of greed and envious expectation. Richard Yorke enjoyed them, and says that he felt his lungs play round his heart. A couple of gardeners were at work upon the lawn, of one of whom he made his way to the stables, the report of the completeness and perfection of which had more than realized him. He entered his furniture—nay, the house and its inmates—were of less consequence in the Squire's eyes than the management of his loose-boxes. The old gynecology of Hoshymnus was re-established at Crompton; the Man here was away, and the beast held in higher account than the Human. The Horse, the Hound, the Pheasant, the Beg-fox, and, fifthly, Man, were the order the gentleman in fact; and a compound being—half man, half brute—was, as it not exactly looked freak of nature, the master of all. Carew had never fed his mares with human flesh, but there was a legend that he had flashed a horse over with aniseed, and offered that dainty morsel to his dogs. The victim was mauled away piecemeal, however, by some officious underling, who justified his interference upon the ground that the hounds would have been poisoned by the indigestible meal the Squire had pardoned him. This was one of the stories that the Squire of Crompton would relate to the country into those who believed it and those who did not; but Walter Grange had told it to Richard as a circumstantial fact.

The stables were indeed a marvel, not only of cleanliness and comfort, but, if it had been possible by any arts of dietitanics to make them comfortable, such would Carew's horses have become. They had looking-glasses in their own glossy coats, and yet it was not well for one of them to be an especial favorite with his master; for more than once happened that he would ride such go often and so long that it fell under him, killed with kindness, overwhelmed with his expressive favor. On such occasions, if the Squire happened to have been as devoted as usual to his brandy flask, he would shed copious tears, which many intimated as a proof that he was neither selfish nor cold-hearted.

The kennels were of vast proportions. Indeed in by high palisades, through the interstices of which many a black muzzle now protruded, snuffing like ill-tempered women, or uttering shrill whines of despair. As Yorke, with his hands buried in his pockets, for they were cold, thoughtfully bent was too well provided with chastening hair to be conscious of the absence of a hat, was contemplating this spectacle with cynical amusement, up strode the chaplain, wholesome and ruddy-looking.

"You are a true heathen—as Crompton hours go —Mr. Yorke; I hope such good habits will not be understood by evil associations. Your absence from your constitution, to be able to face this November mist with a bare head!"

"Nay, parson," rejoined the young man, "you must have risen early yourself to know that there was a mist. It's clear enough now at noon. I suppose our impatient friends yonder, 'pointing to the kennel, where all the dogs, hearing the chaplain's voice, were now in full chorus, "will have their will this morning?'

"Yes; it is this peak's turn to howl."

"I wish, for your sake, Mr. Whymper, that there was only one pack," observed Yorke, with good-natured earnestness.

"Ah, you are referring to that foolish talk about the living last night. Poor Kyll is quite broken-hearted about it this morning. And, in fact, he did do me an ill turn, though, I am sure, without intending it. It is the misfortune of a professed wit—and especially of a poor one—that he can not afford to be silent."

"You talk in most good-humorously than I should," said Yorke. "I should be inclined to charge something for a joke made at my own expense, where the loss was so considerable."

"You don't look of a very revengeful disposition, sulky, returned the chaplain, laughing.

"I have never experienced the feeling of revenge," answered the young man, frankly; "and I know what it is to feel wrongly, and I think it is lucky that it is the law, and not an individual, that has done me the mischief; for now I have a vendetta against the law, you know. But, if it were a man, ay, though he were my own flesh and blood, he should pay for it—with interest. I would not put up with injustice from any human being; and where I could, I would not even need help me, I would right myself with the strong hand."

It was curious to see the effect which this objectless passion wrought upon the young man's face, and even figure. His features appeared to grow rigid; his right hand was clenched convulsively; his handsome Spanish countenance was lit up with a sort of lurid glare.

"My dear young friend," said the chaplain, quietly, "my profession, perhaps, ought to suggest to me some serious argument against such a disposition which you so unmistakably evince; but I will confine myself to saying that a temper as yours is not to be kept for nothing. It is only men in your father's position who can indulge themselves in such a luxury as you have you. I will come to grief with it some day."

Yorke laughed good-humoredly. "What must be, will be. Let us hope there will be no occasion for the display of my fire-works. I suppose, with his two parties in the church and the rest of it, even my father will be brought to behave himself genuinely, sooner or later."

"I should like to see Carew demure," said the chaplain, smiling; "although not reduced to that state by the extremities of poverty, he is, as you say, he added in a graver tone, "the pace at which he has been going those twenty years has been to tell on his fortune. But it is not the dogs that will ruin him (as they ruined poor Kyll), with his few thousands a year to the hunters. It is his race-horses on the Downs yonder that will bring him to his piece of bread."

"I suppose so," said Yorke, coldly. "I care much on Carew's account as on his own; "he lacks a home because it is his own. That is his confounded egotism."

"Your tie of relationship, Mr. Yorke does not, I perceive, make you blind to your father's foibles."

"Why should it?" rejoined the young man, passionately. "Am I to feel grateful to him for begetting me? What has he done to make me feel that I owe him aught? Let me be candid. I thank him for being admitted here, unacknowledged, uninitiated in my own proper name. For being permitted to take my fill at the common trough along with his drunken swine?"

"Nay, my friend," interposed the chaplain, coldly; "the food and wine are of the best; and we should never scoff at good victual. If you have no appetite for it, you will have here? It embarrasses you to answer the question. Let me, then, shape the reply. 'I have a sense of my own dignity,' you would say, 'far keener than that of my father's flatterers and favorites; but, on the other hand, I unfortunately have not much greater stake.'

"I fraternize myself?" reiterated the young man, angrily.

"You take money that is not very generally offered for a mere acceptance, my friend," replied the chaplain, quietly.

"You saw him, did you?" cried Richard, hoarse with shame and passion."

"No; I did not; but I heard him swearing at you at the hazard-table for having emptied his pockets; and I am familiar with his mode of bestowing presents. You must forgive me, Mr. Yorke," added Parson Whymper, dryly; "but you ought to know that when a man has lost his own self-respect, he is hardly entitled to the profession of independence in another."

"If you deem yourself a dependent, Mr. Chaplain," replied Yorke, bitterly, "you still permit yourself some frankness."

"Yes; that is one of the few virtues which are practiced at Crompton. You will find me speak the truth."

There was irony in Parson Whymper's tone; and yet the young man felt that he was not the subject of its cynicism. Was it possible that this hard-featured, hard-living, hard-headed divine was scornful of himself, and of his own degraded position? Yorke did not credit him with any such fine feeling. He was a man of the Crompton's, and could understand the great Dean's bitterness against the Squire, and even his dependent guests, but that a man should become despicable to himself, was unintelligible to him.

"Of course," continued the chaplain, smiling at his evident bewilderment, "I could have been as much offended as you, Mr. Yorke, at your friend; but I had estimated your good sense too highly to endeavor to conciliate you by such vulgar means."

"I thank you," said Yorke, thoughtfully. "I hope you were right there. I am sure at least that from your mouth I could hear home truths, which from another's would be very unpalatable. You are good enough to speak as though you would wish us to be friends. I am going to ask you, therefore, to do me a favor."

"I will do any thing that lies in my power; but do not, for your own sake, press me to influence your father's mind."

"No, no; it is not that," broke in the other, hastily. "I flies with yourself to grant my request. I wish to have a private talk with you at Carew's marriage with my mother.

"Tut story!" exclaimed Parson Whymper.

"Nay; I can not vouch for being possessed of that. I have only heard it from your grandmother: the counsel for the defense, whom a scrupulous reliable authority for the facts of a case."

"And I am ready to hear," said Yorke. "Let me now, for the first time, know what was urged upon the other side, and so qualify, that which I have hitherto heard only. It is made my mother an outcast, and myself a disgraced and penniless lad. I have a right to know exactly what was the end of it all, so do not fear to shock me."

"There can be no disgrace where one has not one's self to blame," urged the chaplain.

"You think so?" broke in the other, bitterly. "What! not when one's mother is made the instance? Well, please begin."

"Not just now," said the chaplain.

"It would be much better for you to get the newspaper report of the case—I can tell you the date—and read what was urged there."

"No report was ever published, Mr. Whymper; the case was hushed up with closed doors, or suppressed by Carew's influence. No much, perhaps—to judge by your face—the better for me."

"I think it was," said the chaplain, "but I hear it, even now, Mr. Yorke," returned the chaplain, not without a touch of tenderness in his tone. "But, if you insist upon it, I must, in my private room, and let us breakfast together first, then we will go to the matter in question."

Accordingly, the two repaired to the apartment in question—a very snug one, on the ground-floor, but so crammed with manuscripts and letters that it resembled a lawyer's sanctum. The morning repast, which, in fact, the chaplain consisted of a game-pie and a tankard of strong ale—having been here dispatched, and their cigars lighted, Parson Whymper began his narrative.

"It must have been in the autumn of 1831 that Carew finally left the service of the Marquis of Harton. He got into some difficulties with the authorities—refused, I believe, to apologize for some misdemeanor, and left the army in a privately withdrawn."

"I beg your pardon there," remarked Yorke, hastily. "He was expelled, as I happen to know for certain."

"Very likely," said the chaplain, slowly expelling the smoke from his lips; "indeed, I should say most likely. But remember mine is necessarily ex ergo information. Mrs. Carew—I mean Mrs. Carew the elder—is solely responsible for it. She was not in a position to get the facts against her son, and I have no doubt made compensation for so doing by highly coloring the offenses of the Commander. In this case, you would not like the story. Is it still your wish that I should proceed?"

"Yes, yes," said Yorke; "go on. I was a fool to interrupt you. But the chaplain noticed that the young man's face had flushed all over his face, under pretense of shielding it from the fire, and that his cheeks grew scarlet as the tale went on, nevertheless.

"Carew was not seventeen then, when he left school for the house of the Marquis of Harton, one of Hardcastle, in Berkshire, as his private pupil. It was considered that he was to be a boy of his own age and attention, but not his exclusive services. There were one or two other pupils—rather queer customers, I believe—and Mr. Hardcastle advertised in the newspapers for lads of position, but neglected to mention by his surname. In short, who had proved unmanageable at home—and undertook to reform them by his system. It was no wonder, then, that Carew found some strange companions. The strangest of all, however, under the circumstances, was surely the boy's niece, Miss Hardcastle herself."

"Why strangest?" interrupted Yorke.

"I think Mrs. Carew was fortunate to imply that this young lady, being possessed of great physical advantages, should have been the last person selected by Mr. Hardcastle as his housekeeper, and the companion of his pupils, and the event seems to have well borne, as it afterward turned out, that she had already succeeded in victimizing (such was Mrs. Carew's expression) three of these very lads. That was years ago, it is true; and it might well be imagined that a lady of the mature age of five-and-thirty might have outlived her charms; but in her particular case this was not so. Miss Hardcastle, in short, was called, was still very beautiful, high-spirited, and an excellent horsewoman. She was also—if that had been necessary to obtain her purpose—well-read and accomplished. Being clever, good-looking, and not easily shocked, however, she was more than competent to secure the affections of young Carew. She was, nevertheless, at first said, literally old enough to be his mother; and the idea of the affair having been a love-match, in the usual sense of the expression, was simply preposterous. That Miss Hardcastle was bereft of this quality was more evident from her having enjoined secrecy upon her youthful bridegroom. They lived together as man and wife, under Mr. Hardcastle's roof, for some six months before their marriage was proclaimed. Then young Mr. Carew took a bold step—a step which needed her husband to bring her to his house, under the roof of which his mother was then residing. But they did not come (as one might have imagined) in the fashion of two runaway lovers, who seek forgiveness for their youthful ardor with penitence and submission. The bridegroom was full of wild mirth at having at last done something seriously to astonish the world. He was fond of his mother, after his fashion; looked up to her from entreating her forgiveness, he did not even perceive any particular necessity for conciliation. The bride was full of triumph; she had not risked much, and she had won a great stake. It would have been better for her could she have borne her success with more moderation. Her mother-in-law was transported with rage, which she was too wise to exhibit. She knew very well her former rival as wife did; and she felt that opposition was for the present hopeless: but she took counsel with her son's friends, and bided her time. Let come at last, though very slowly. Carew was elevated to the position of a male twelve-month—a longer time than youth and beauty combined have ever enthralled him since. Even when her tender sense—for she had the sweetest voice that ever woman possessed—failed to thrill him, and her heavenly form no longer charmed, probably her love cemented to take part against her, but for her own importance. She lost her temper with him upon a occasion when it is thought the weakest of her sex to keep it: she grew jealous."

"Without cause?" inquired Yorke, puffing at his cigar but going out, though he still held it between his white lips.

"No; just cause, of course. That is a point, I fancy, about which my informant had her reasons for not being explicit."

"What?" exclaimed the young man, indignantly.

She threw some one in her son's way, to divert his attention from herself and wife?"

"Perhaps; I can't say for certain. I am not defending her, Mr. Yorke; but remember, she loved her son. She beheld him a victim to an artful woman. He was not in her eyes as he is in yours and mine, young man. He had been urged, expeditious of good, an affectionate and grateful nature, he was the best partie in the county, and she had chosen his tutor's sweet niece, a man old enough to have borne him. Besides, he was not the first wife. The lowrger had secretly taken legal opinion upon that matter, and was only waiting for an opportunity to test it. It was essential for her that her son should marry his own freedom, and at last he did so. I have called upon the occasion. In the whirlwind of his wrath, your mother told Carew some house truths; above all, let him know she despised him, and had despised him from the morning. She had no other name for her, henceforth, but Serpent."

"I know," said Yorke. "Go on."

"It was within two months of your birth that this quarrel took place. I had been here, and especially here at Crompton, I think the rupture would never have happened. Your grandmother, a lady of spirit, and did her utmost to precipitate matters, and, as you know, she was successful. Miss Hardcastle—in her own opinion—to leave the house, and an action was commenced in an ecclesiastical court. The validity of the marriage was questioned on the ground of private publication of the bans, both parties having a knowledge of the facts. Carew's parents, you know, and this bit of law lies in my way. The bride appeared in the register as spinster, whereas she was the widow of an old squall of her own ek's, whose surname you bear. It was not an easy victory to obtain means. The judge of the Consistory Court held that the inaccuracy in question was insufficient to invalidate the ceremony had taken place, and rather your grandmother appealed to the Court of Arches, and got the decision reversed. The marriage was therefore declared null and void. Very hard lines it was for you, Mr. Yorke; and—and that's the whole story."

"I thank you," said the young man, gravely. "I can easily imagine that it might have been told by other lips in harsher terms."

They were silent for full a minute, Yorke buying himself with puffs of the document upon the table, written out in the chaplain's sprawling hand.

"Your mother must be a most remarkable woman," observed the latter, thoughtfully. "Is she still young enough to bear her part?"

"Yes; very. What a queer docket is here! 'Tis Mine. Refused. What does that mean?"

"It is an application from one Trevethick, an inn-keeper, to purchase a disused mine at Gerlan, on the west coast of Cornwall, which Carew has declined. Two thousand pounds was offered on the nail, a sum far beyond its value; but it is one of his estates that his property there is very valuable, and it's evident that this Trevethick thinks he has—whereas it is not—a bargain. He is a grandsear of position, Gethin Castle, or rather what is left of it, for it is a ruin, is indeed unequaled! You should take your sketch-book down there, some day. May I ask, by-the-by, are you only an amateur in this way, or a professional?"

"I am an artist by profession. I live by my pencil, save for what my mother allows me out of Carew's pittance. That is small enough, you know. Hollo! there are the hounds coming round to the front! I suppose Carew and the rest of them will soon be in the saddle?"

"And you have never made money by any other means?" pursued the chaplain, thoughtfully.

"Never. Why do you ask?"

"Well, it seemed so strange that a lad like you should find purchasers for his works," returned the chaplain, carelessly. "The Picturesque' is a publication well be of service to you, much."

"Yes. I shall get my education at Crompton, if I get no other," said Yorke, bitterly. "And indeed, as I have no desire to peril my neck out hunting, I shall set to work at once. Good-morning, Mr. Chaplain—I mean Whymper. And with a nod and a smile, the young man left the room.

Parson Whymper looked after him with a grave face. "I wonder whether Fane was right, for once?" he mused upon point-blank; though, 'tis true, he owed him a grudge for putting him at play. There was something strong in that young fellow's face, he said: "Never, when I asked him that question as to whether he gained money by other means. If he lied, the lying must have come from the mother's side. That woman must be a marvel. Lord, Mr. Carew! I should like to shed Richard Yorke to have had his chance here."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE HEIGHT OF THE SEASON—Fahren-heit.

A dying Irishman was asked by his confessor if he was ready to renounce the devil and all his works. "Oh, your Honor," said Pat, "don't ask me that; I am going to a strange country, and I don't intend to make myself enemies."

A farmer's wife, in speaking of the smartness, agreeable manners and beauty of her daughter, said, "She has had a liberal education; why, she can parse, and say all the bible, repeat the whole catechism, and read a sermon as well as the minister." "Indeed," added the young hopeful, "and yesterday I licked Ned Stevens, flounced the cat into the well, and stole old Bickley's gimlet."

The proprietor of a hotel was bustling about the other morning at an early hour, when a traveler, who had been one asked him why he didn't call up his wife. "I don't call him as long as I can help it," replied he; "for when he is in bed I know where he is, but when he is up he is anywhere and every where."

A scene in a picture-gallery shows "a model mother" in a man who serves as a model for an artist, and in the artist's studio sometime after. "Is that for me, Sir?" "From whom did N'Gilp paint that head?" "From a model, apparently, madam." "Is it for love of all 'is 'oly men." "He must find you a very neutral tint indeed." "Is that for me, Sir?" "Madam, from his conversa, which I have had to put in pallet, and fix palette, I've got to do a little bit of you."

"Well, Annie, how did you get along with that hard sum of a lesson at school?" "Oh, splendid; I'm getting rid of him." "Oh yes; I got rid of him very nicely. I married him, and have to love him now."

"My son," said an old lawyer, giving advice to his son, who was just entering upon the practice of his father's profession, "if you have a client for the law in charity on your side, but justice seems to be against him, never give him any reason to suppose that you have. If, on the other hand, you are in doubt about the justice of your client's case in dealing with your practice, insist upon the necessity of doing justice even to the devil himself." "Father," said the young hopeful, "how shall I account for it in case I am asked, and justice are dead against me?" "In that case, my son," replied the old slyger, "talk around it."

If a man is given to liquor, see that liquor is not given to him.

A lady from the country, who has lately become a resident of the city, was very much surprised at her son's long absence from home the other evening. A messenger-boy was sent for him, and he came prompt to see the elephant. "Ah!" said the mother, with a sigh of relief; "I'm glad to see you here! I have been desirous to his seeing the elephant, and didn't even know he was in town."

"A friend of ours," says the editor of a contemporary, "is possessed of a handsome and wonderful boy. He has got so weak now that he can't raise five dollars."

A Scotchman who had put up at an inn was asked in the morning how he would like his eggs. "Boiled, Sir," said he, "but we'll either, but I was mickle behind my time last night, for the deil was busy about us wi' the bale nicht."

The New Bedford Standard records a little incident of Secretary Boutwell, which proved none that city. The secretary was visiting the public schools, and addressed the boys and soldiers in the centre, and the public generally, in a circle formed in front of them. When the military stood shoulder to shoulder, somewhat during the time from a general order to dismiss-late ever. A young man of the old grave persuasion, apparently from the country, was accosted, followed by the military, and addressed them thus: "My dear friends, you present our serious appearance, standing up there right in front of us." Answer by high private: "Yes, Sir, we are standing up here to get a chance through the war." Honorable withdrawal.

Two young men of a country town were laughable about which describes the mathematical process by which Mr. Jones's horse arrived at the value of certain conflicting evidences. "Gentlemen of the jury," this man is expected to have said, in summing up the evidence in a trial where the witnesses had sworn with remarkable honesty to the value of a horse, witnesses who swear that the water-course used to flow in a ditch on the north side of the hedge, on the south land, gentlemen, there are nine witnesses who swear that the water-course used to flow in a ditch on the south of the hedge. Now, gentlemen, if nine witnesses wholly uncontradicted, and I recommend you to give your verdict for the plaintiff."

Charity who called those six witnesses."

"His process, however, was hardly as clever as that of the Irish prisoner accused of stealing a shirt from a hedge. "There are three people who saw you take it," said the magistrate. "Bad luck to them! exclaimed Walsh; "if I'd seen them, I'd assuredly have seen what they didn't see me take it!"

A teacher, catechising his scholars, put the following question: "Who was the greatest general that ever lived?" "Matches," cried one of the youngsters, after a short pause.

INTERIOR OF A SWIMMING BATH.—[DRAWN BY STANLEY FOX.]

INTERIOR OF SWIMMING BATH.

We give on this page an illustration of the swimming bath at the foot of Charles Street, of which we gave an exterior view in the Weekly for July 16. It contains 68 rooms, the water is four and a half feet deep, and 200 bathers can be accommodated at one time. Each bather is allowed to remain in the water 30 minutes. There is another swimming bath of the same kind at the foot of Thirteenth Street, and both are crowded every day. The success of these experiments should lead to the establishment of other baths in sufficient numbers to accommodate all who desire to avail themselves of these healthful privileges. Such institutions are not only beneficial to the poor, who are unable to leave the hot and sweltering city during the summer, but to the whole community, as all are equally interested in preserving the health of our population.

OLD TREASURES.

THE picture on page 537 is engraved from a water-color drawing by Mr. H. B. ROBERTS, a member of the English Institute of Painters in Water-Color. A lady is seen seated in an old wainscoted chamber, before a table on which is a casket, and the contents of which she is examining. In pensive mood she has laid her late aside, and her attention is fixed mournfully, not upon the jewels nor the richer contents of the casket, but, it would seem, upon a few dry flower-petals and leaves. What story do they tell? Who is this melancholy lady? The costume she wears—her ruff, her head-dress, with its long veil, the slashed sleeves of her black velvet robe, tell us no more than that they belong to the middle of the sixteenth century. But what is the meaning of that inscription on the oak panel in the back-ground—"Eliz." and the date "1565," with an indefinite coat of arms between abbreviated name and date? Is this the lion-hearted Queen Bess herself in her more susceptible youth, before her features became so strongly marked as to render any mistake respecting her identity very difficult to make? Possibly the painter intended or may permit such suggestion, and, if so, the render will not be slow to build up his own romance from the incident.

UNDINE.

FOUQUÉ'S most beautiful romance has rarely found a more appreciative illustrator than MISS STARR, an English artist, whose graceful picture, of which we give an engraving on page 541, was recently exhibited in the Royal Academy of London. The picture illustrates one of the most touching incidents of the romance. The handsome young knight, Huldebrand, the hero of the story, has wedded the lovely Naiad, or Undine. He had met her first, after traversing the enchanted forest, in the cottage of the humble fisherfolk, her foster-parents. He had become enamored of her beauty; her childlike artlessness, the very pranks which with soulless thoughtlessness she had played, had served but to increase her fascination; he had braved the terrible midnight storm and the swollen torrent, the work of Undine's kinsman, the powerful sea-prince, when recovering her from the island whom she had sought refuge from the chiding of her foster-mother; and the nuptials of the lovers had at length taken place. Undine herself had become possessed of a soul upon the only condition possible to her—a union of deepest love with one of the human race. From her love for the knight and for the gift of a soul she had rendered herself liable to suffer all the sorrows and disappointments of which the human race is susceptible. But she had still to tell him her true nature. So, when wandering together near the forest stream, now shrunk to a small brook, she, with tender anxious mystery, asked him to bear her to the small island from which he had before rescued her. Arrived there, she commenced the wondrous disclosure: "Thou shouldst know, my beloved," she began, "that there exist in the elements beings not very unlike you men, yet who seldom let themselves be seen by you. The marvelous salamanders glitten and sport in the flames; the rough, malicious gnomes dwell deep in the earth; the woods are haunted by spirits which are of the air, while the far-spread race of water-spirits live in lakes, and rivers, and brooks; they dwell, too, in resounding crystal vaults, through which heaven with its sun and stars shine in, and lofty coral plants with blue and red blossoms decorate their gardens: they wander over bright sands strown with many-colored shells, and amidst all that the old world possessed of beautiful, which the present world is no longer worthy to enjoy, and which the waves conceal with their mysterious veil of silver. There are still preserved noble ruins, high and stately, gently laved by loving waters, which cherish about them delicate mosses and wreathing plants. Those who dwell there are pure, and lovely to look upon, fairer than even mankind." She proceeds to tell him of the fate of these beings, of the only means by which they can avoid their destiny; and then exclaims—"Now have I a soul; I thank thee for my soul, oh, thou unspeakably beloved! and evermore grateful shall I be if thou dost not by thy gift make me miserable during my future life; for what will become of me if thou hatest me, and drivest me from thee? Yet I would not detain thee by deceit. If thou wilt reject me, do it now; go back alone to the shore; I will plunge into that stream to my kinsman, who leads here a hermit-life away from his other friends. But he is powerful, and receives tribute from many great rivers; and as he bore me to the fisherman, a joyous, laughing child, so will he carry me back to my parents a loving, sorrowful woman gifted with a soul." Then follows the passage which MISS STARR directly illustrates: "She was about to add something more, when Huldebrand, with the most heartfelt tenderness and love, clasped her in his arms and again bore her back to the shore. There, amidst tears and kisses, he first swore never to forsake his affectionate wife, and esteemed himself even more happy than Pygmalion, for whom Venus gave life to his beautiful statue, and thus changed it into a beautiful wife."

SIGNAL TOWERS IN CUBA.

The great want of lines of communication in the island of Cuba has undoubtedly been the principal cause of the prolongation of the war. Railways exist only in the sugar districts, as Havana, Matanzas, and Cardenas, excepting the short lines from Sagua, Trinidad, and Cienfuegos to the plantations, and that between Nuevitas and Puerto Principe. Regarding telegraphs, the island is but little better provided, and a good town road is an astonishing object, which exists only in the minds of enterprising individuals. Detachments of troops have frequently spent a day or two separating them, are as isolated from each other as if they were hundreds of miles apart, the entire interior being covered with dense and mountainous virgin forests, or else impassable swamps. In order to help this country more firmly, the Spaniards have just inaugurated the building of towers, of which we give a sketch on page 552, combining the advantages of a signal tower and a fort. As the insurgents are unprovided with artillery, these forts, although they may be defended by only about twenty men, must be considered impregnable. The towers are built on places, having by their elevation possible, a most surrounding the glacis, and an interior and extensive range of stakes and palisades make the mere approach very difficult. The lower part of the fort, being an earthwork surrounding a strong wooden frame, is bomb-proof, and protects its inmates from the enemy's fusillade. In some districts where a small swivel, or revolving cannon, will be placed.

These towers will be erected first on the line from Cruges de Neuvas to Moron, at a distance of five miles from each other, and good roads will be be opened between them. The signal will be made either by wooden blocks moved by a chain, or by flags from the tower, and with colored lanterns and rockets at night. It is supposed that the erection of these towers will mark a new era in Cuban warfare, and never very sanguine as the Cubans, whose leaders have given strict orders to use their utmost endeavors to prevent the work, recognizing the danger which these towers offer, and which will enable the Spaniards to throw five thousand active and acclimated men into the field, who are now doing garrison duty in the numerous settlements and towns in the Cinco Villas and Central Department.

THE EXTINCTION OF WORLDS.

The progress of science enables us to trace, with a probability almost amounting to certainty, the career of a star from its birth; from the moist diffused condition of its parent nebula, through the stage of primary agglomeration when it shines as our sun through the process of cooling into a dim and cloudy spheroid, such as Jupiter or our earth; until cold rules supreme, and the once glowing orb tells its history like the moon.

But when we have reached this stage we have by no means done with the star. It must continue on its course, and, though in obscurity, it must retain its momentum and its attractive force. Our sun will thus one day travel in darkness, attended by a cohort of funereal planets, and perpetual night will reign over the solar system. This result appears to be but a question of time, and we may, therefore, bid to the consideration that many systems must, in all probability, be already extinct, and unrecognized as sacred. But as extinction is a gradual process, there will be multitudes of stars in various stages of dimness, and the brilliancy of which is "magnitude" in fact, will therefore depend on its age, quite as much as on its size or distance. On this view, Sir. W. Herschel's method of "star gauging" can not be relied on for a correct determination of the actual shape of the cluster called the "Milky-Way," as, instead of taking the number of brightness as an indication of the average of distance, we have to superadd the average of age. Now, the smaller the star the sooner quickly will it pass to age, and, therefore, the necessary extent of our galaxy is immensely reduced; in other words, it appears that while the space separating us from the nearer stars, for which parallax has been obtained, remains of some unchanged, the antiquated distances of those hitherto considered to be farthest off will be much lessened, as there appears to be no reason for concluding that telescopic stars are necessarily more distant than bright ones for which we can not obtain parallax, but simply that they are older, or smaller, or both, and therefore dimmer.

It will be readily allowed that, if the light of the stars be fading away, a vast number may have already become extinct, and that it is indeed possible that the orbs now visible may be but a small surviving remnant of far greater multitudes which have since illumined the sky. If our cluster then be much reduced in extent, and its constituents be largely removed from each other, it would follow that the chances against collision would be much reduced. Let us suppose that collisions are possible, and that their frequency is merely a question of chances. What would be the consequences of such an event? It is possible that they would depend chiefly on the relative momenta of the colliding bodies: that if one were very much larger than the other, and the velocities high, the temperature would be raised sufficiently to dissipate the smaller into gas, while merely heating or, possibly, liquefying the larger. If the bodies were nearly of a size, and their momenta great, possibly both would be reduced to a gaseous condition; in either case their tendency would be to form ultimately a body equal in weight to the sum of its two constituents. Either the larger body would annex the smaller, or, if both became dislocated, the fervid gases would radiate their heat and contract anew into a system possibly containing a sun and planets.

Again, supposing that two bodies approached each other in a direct manner, and that a collision, that is, so that their mutual gravity causes them to lose all motion and revolve around each other, we should have the explanation of the existence of double, treble, multiple stars: we should also understand how it happens that certain stars (Sirius, for instance) are accompanied by non-luminous ones. Also, it would appear that extinct stars are really far more numerous than is generally supposed, the theory which regards the revolving star as extinct, being in fact the cause of the variability of certain stars receives much support.

Thus, in the course of time, nebulæ would form suns, suns would grow cold, or, while yet glowing, would collide, or would revolve in pairs with other suns, till gradually space would be peopled with suns, larger and larger, but less and less thickly scattered. Pursuing the idea, we arrive at a period when all the stars of each galaxy shall become aggregated into one vast fiery globe—nay, when all these vast galactic suns shall come together and form one great central sun in which all the matter once scattered through space shall be collected, accomplishing its successive fusion in a cosmic furnace—a world without a sun—a cold and naked bulk.

MICHAEL FARADAY.

In his young days Faraday used to attend Kean's performances with intense interest, and later in life he was wont to relate how the dramatic representations of the Shakspearean drama produced under the management of Charles Kean recently; and Jenny Lind's delicious voice occasionally charmed him to forget his cares. He himself mimic, had a fine ear, and could sing agreeably; indeed, there was hardly any form of excitation to the art or science which his sensitive temperament was not keenly alive. He took great pleasure in a good novel, and some notes extant of a conversation he was only engaged in he held with a friend at the house of Mrs. M——, in Clarges Street, W., at the time when Dickens he was wont to appear now and then at an evening party. It was a winter evening, in the month of January, 1851. He had invited a few to a refreshment-room, decorated with ribbons, and sparkling in an ante-room. Faraday, taking a glass of punch, presented it abruptly to the novelist, and said, "Ah! you great silly cat, with your bowl of punch, how do you like it?" "Why, I did drew itself up offended. "Puss is not fond of punch," said Faraday, "but perhaps you are addressing a lion!" "Oh, I beg your pardon," retort; and then followed some talk which presently turned upon some of the performances to be got out of them, and Faraday said, "I like the stirring ones—with plenty of life, plenty of action, and very little sentiment." "Ah, you are the philosophy for myself, but I want the comfort to speak to my friends of the impression of scene, and to give me an interest which takes me out of my own immediate pursuits. It does me much good to get out of myself, and to dismiss my air his thoughts a little."

He then mentioned the novel of "Paul Ferroll" as having sir enough in it, and added, "There's another modern one I like very well, too, where a person keeps his words to the top of his house." This was the novel of "Jane Eyre." "Ah!" said Faraday, "I see you can't keeps you awake. Why, how good the woman's flight is across the fields! but there's a touch of commonplace about it, and it's not the right sort of scene, and to give me an interest which takes me out of my own immediate pursuits. It does me much good to get out of myself, and to dismiss my air his thoughts a little."

What Did It?

Lyon's Kathairon made my hair soft, luxuriant, and thick, and Hagan's Magnolia Balm changed that sallow complexion into the marble beauty you now see. This is emphatically the language of all who use these articles. A fine head of hair and a refined complexion are the greatest attractions a woman can possess. The Kathairon and Magnolia Balm are just what will give them to you, and nothing else will. The Balm is the bloom of youth. It makes a lady of thirty appear but twenty. Both articles are entirely harmless, and very pleasant. They should be in every lady's possession.

My Daughter Elinor.

8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.

A good American novel, presenting life and society in the United States—the life that we live and the society of which we are a constituent part—has long been the desideratum of publishers and the despair of novel-readers. * * * A story in which the characters are types of the American people at large, differing from the social representatives of other countries, is rarely issued from the press. Such a story is "My Daughter Elinor," which is destined to attain a wide popularity, because delineating with naturalness and verisimilitude the life that is around us. It is from such books that the historian gathers the habits of the age of which he writes. In Mr. Grey we have the portraiture of the accomplished politician: in "My Daughter Elinor" we have a real woman of the nineteenth century, as many a reader has made love to in the days of premières jeunesses. The style is easy and graceful, and the most straining overmuch at epigram, and again running a little into slipshod; and the dialogue is rapid and effective, never tortured with obvious comment or teasing with inevitable inference. Mrs. Hackett is a fine and delightful Miss Malaprop, and Tod Tilman is an original drawn from nature.—N. Y. Evening Post.

In the new novel which is justly regarded as the most successful attempt yet made to depict truthfully the social forces which predominate in a work, the personal characteristics of our manners and social characters.—Boston Transcript.

Miss Van Kortland.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"MY DAUGHTER ELINOR."

8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

"Miss Van Kortland" is a fashionable, high-bred book, the best characters being such as "live, move, and have their being" in great cities—in the instances in New York—but which are individual enough and universal enough to be citizens of the world at large. It combines the best features of the American fashionable life so well depicted as here: nor can we recall so faithful a portrait of an American belle as Miss Van Kortland. She is a superb, womanly creature, of whose love any man might be proud. * * * Bright, lively, entertaining, with occasional touches of power, "Miss Van Kortland" is the finest American novel of the year.—N. Y. Tribune.

KING WILLIAM AND HIS ARMY.

THE King of Prussia to-day stands at the head of the most formidable army in the world. The whole male population of his kingdom may be said to be trained for arms, and is always ready to take the field. For offensive warfare every man from the age of twenty to that of thirty-six is enrolled, either in the regular army or in the landwehr; and in the landsturm, for defensive operations within the country, to the age of fifty. The Prussian army is divided into companies, battalions, regiments, and corps d'armée. The war strength of a battalion is 1002 men, consisting of four companies. Three battalions go to a regiment, two regiments to a brigade, two brigades to a division. A division includes, in addition, a proportional force of cavalry, several batteries of artillery, and a battalion of riflemen or of pioneers; while a corps d'armée, being considered a unit, complete and independent in itself, carries all the stores and appliances required for a campaign. Including those of the annexed provinces and of the guards, Prussia possesses in all thirteen corps d'armée.

According to the charter of 1867, every North German is liable to service, and no substitution is allowed. The Federal troops take the oath of fealty to the Federal generalissimo, and all form one army under his command.

The total strength of the army of the North German Confederation amounts to 319,358 men on the peace footing, and to 977,262 men on the war footing, and by the mobilization of the reserve troops it may be raised to the latter standard within about a fortnight, as was proved during the Austro-Prussian struggle four years ago.

These figures represent the army of the North German Confederation. But it is necessary, also, to add the military resources of the non-confederate states of the South, which have cast in their lot with the fatherland. This augments number 50,000 men on her peace establishment, and 30,000 more in time of war: while Würtemberg can furnish, in war time, 34,405 men, and Baden 20,722. In the year 1866, when Prussia was much smaller than she is now, 418,500 soldiers crossed into Austria, while 193,000 remained at home.

The engraving on our first page is a copy from a painting by the German artist STEFFECH, and represents the King of Prussia at the head of his army at Sadowa.

FORWARD!

FOR a political party, as we said last week, the past is not enough. Yet the past of the Republican party is most brilliant. As Senator CONKLING said in his fine speech at Saratoga: "The Republican party has done much—indeed, more than any political organization in history." And Vice-President COLFAX truly says that "every lover of liberty and human rights throughout the world sympathizes with it." If to recount our old glories were to gain new, our task would be easy. But victories are not won by the camp fire, but in the field. Senator CONKLING says further, and truly: "The work of the Republican party is not finished, nor is there any other party able or willing to finish it." We hope the Convention of New York will feel the truth of that remark so deeply that they will steer the party of the past to be finished by distinctly declaring what is next to be done, and in a spirit which will insure its performance. Mr. COLFAX pointedly states what Congress has done. But the difficulty is not in what it did, but in what it failed to do. We do not deny the merit of what he says. But he will not deny that the party is not so strong as when Congress met. It is evident, therefore, that the way to success does not lie in rehearsing its good deeds.

Besides, the important party consideration, in a review of Congressional action, is the question not only whether that action is generally allowed to be beneficial, but whether it was the result of an acknowledged policy. Upon the questions of the war we were all agreed. The party spoke and acted like one man, and like a hero. But are we all agreed upon the questions of the peace? Moreover, has the Republican majority of the Senate been in the least degree mindful of its party responsibility? Has it not, if not actually inviting differences with the Executive, yet delighted to assert its own will when differences arose? Has not its success does not lie in rehearsing its good deeds.

Has it not actually inviting differences with the Executive, yet delighted to assert its own will when differences arose? Has it not, if not, for instance, the rejection of Mr. HOAR, for the reasons alleged, a wanton act of power inevitably rebuking party cohesion, not merely as an insult offered to the better sentiment of the party, but by the challenge thrown to the President, and by the suspicion it awakened of a dangerous general tendency upon the part of the Senate? Can it fairly be said that we have had a financial policy as well as a war policy? Was the contemptuous indifference to the civil service reform so profound in the Senate that Mr. SCHURZ, who introduced it so early in December, never called it up, although the session was prolonged into July, while Mr. JOHNSON'S Rebel House lately sought to put his bill to prevent its disastrous defeat—was this indifference at this time and upon this subject a sagacious party position?

We mention these things as illustrations. As we have heretofore said, one explanation of the action of Congress, and therefore of the party situation, is to be found in the fact that Congress was dealing with questions for which it was not elected, and upon which it had not as party instructions. But those questions remain. They are now paramount. A new Congress is to be elected. The imperative necessity of the hour, therefore, is to instruct that Congress. And that instruction must be given in the plainest declaration of principles. Now was there ever a better opportunity. In the State of New York the contest is at the last doubtful. The last two elections have gone heavily against us. The Democrats will reominate for Governor the author of the Erie bill, one of the most unprincipled and dangerous acts perpetrated in a state governed by law. Notwithstanding the conduct in the Erie affair, which should be enough in an honest community to exclude Mr. HOFFMAN from political life forever, his party hope to re-elect him by an enormous majority, to which the frauds which elected him two years ago will powerfully contribute. It is a position, therefore, in which the Republican party should aim to recover its old strength by displaying its old spirit. And that old spirit is the spirit of the war; a heroic acceptance and treatment of the situation.

Shirking and shuffling and glozing will insure defeat. Fouling backward will not win the field before us. Sofferino and Magenta do not avail Louis NAPOLEON to the discoverers of the glory of Austerlitz save his uncle at Waterloo. What do the Republicans of New York think of the reduction of taxation, what of the reform of taxation, what of the reform of the civil service, what of Cuba, what of the labor question? If the Convention is managed by those who have no opinion upon these questions, or who are afraid to express it, who suppose that in the present situation true wisdom is to smile and wink and say nothing, we shall pay the penalty of cowardice. At worst, we can but be beaten. Shall we then refuse to raise the slogan which will rouse the host sluggish and indifferent and send us all into the fight with the enthusiasm and the faith of '60 and '64 and '68?

Nor must we forget that conspicuous men are themselves platforms, and that the party which nominates them will be judged by them. Mr. PENDLETON was the Democratic platform of '64, and GENERAL BLAIR that of '68. When Tammany renominates Mr. HOFFMAN the Democratic platform in New York will be unbosomed in all electoral frauds and the principles of the Erie bill, as plainly as if they were declared. And if the secret of Republican success lies in its old spirit applied to the new issues, it must not only distinctly declare itself upon them, but its candidate for Governor of the State, upon whose name who is identified with the work which Senator CONKLING tells us yet remains to be done.

CÆSARISM AND DEFEAT.

THE most powerful argument in historical experience for the practical superiority of the popular form of government, when in accordance with which this country, at the end of a terrible civil war, endured the assassination of its chief magistrate. There was a great shock, a profound sorrow and indignation, and public tranquility immediately settled over the tragedy like the gray sea over a sunset cloud. It may be truly said that there was no apprehension of any interruption of the operation of the government. There was universal understanding to see if perfect provision had been made for its continuance in the event of the assassination of all the chief officers. The secret of the public serenity was that the Government represents the popular will.

But Cæsarism when CÆSAR dies or is defeated ends in anarchy. The EMPRESS EUGÉNIE is reported to have said at Cherbourg that a decisive signal over a defeat would be the end of the Napoleonism dynasty. And her words were confirmed by the evident fear of the Ministry when the news of the disaster arrived in Paris, and by the ostentatious publication of the amount of the military force in and around Paris; a proclamation which was evidently designed to intimate to the disaffected that there were soldiers enough to keep them in order. The official journals declared the impregnability of the fortifications of Paris; and, after the declared opposition of M. THIERS to the war, the Empress was said to have declared that, for the health of M. THIERS, who built the fortifications of Paris." But his master, LOUIS PHILIPPE, built them, as did the Bourbons. In 1840 he fled the Tuileries against the Fanbourgs.

The folly of Cæsarism, of any form of personal government, in a country like that of high civilization, is now apparent. The Plebiscitum has been cited as proof of the essential popularity and consequent stability of the Napoleonic. What are the facts? In 1852 LOUIS NAPOLEON was elected Emperor by nearly 8,000,000 of votes against less than 5,000,000. In 1870 his title was confirmed by a vote of 7,000,000 against 1,500,000. LOUIS NAPOLEON said, "The nation has voted if they were free." He was at the end of May. In the beginning of August he loses a battle, and the question proves to be wholly untrue. The Plebiscitum utters not from the threat of a foreign foe, but from domestic hostility. Yet there has been no serious change of public opinion. In the spring LOUIS NAPOLEON said, "I give you the alternative—by empire or anarchy." France could not, of course, have a republic, and it supported the empire as the least of two evils. But the empire was not the choice of France.

The misery of the Empire is that that the alternative is perpetual. In England, if Parliament disprove a war the crown must submit. If LOUIS NAPOLEON'S constitution, on the other hand, the Emperor has the power of peace and war. The people have really no authorized voice. The French Ministry is not, as in England, a committee representing the people, and therefore, when great disaster threatens, there is a cry for a Committee of Defense, which would be really the Government. The moment the Government is strained it begins to crack and yield. And as there is no method provided by which the people may regularly and lawfully change the course of affairs, as in England and the United States, revolution and anarchy are at once imminent. If seven millions of Frenchmen had really and honestly supported the Napoleonic dynasty in May, does any body suppose that a military reverse in August would have endangered it? On the contrary, nothing would have so strengthened it. The effect of the first defeat in this war is to show the weakness and hollowness of the Napoleonic system; and, whatever the future chances of the campaign may be, every thoughtful man must see that there is no hope of permanent tranquility in France until the Government is really in accord with the people. But this accord can never be accomplished by any form of Cæsarism or Napoleonism.

"PROGRESSIVE DEMOCRACY."

A CRITIC says of a certain religion that if you would know what its founder taught you must carefully examine what its most bigoted disciples declare that he did not teach. In like manner, experience shows that if we would know what the Democratic party is likely to do we must ascertain what the World declares it ought not to do. Before and during the last Presidential campaign this lively paper poured out advice upon its party which, although shrewd enough, was totally disregarded. In the late Democratic contest in this State it prophesied and counseled in the loudest tones —to what result the undisputed ascendency of Mr. TWEED and his friends shows. As the field begins to open upon which the next Presidential struggle is to take place, the World, undismayed by its unbroken record of error, again dons the robes of Mentor, and proposes itself as the Democratic guide, philosopher, and friend. Its strain is now and always the same: "Politics is expediency. Submit to the inevitable. Accept the accomplished. Don't kick against the pricks, or, at least, don't succeed."

The present effort of this much-contemned counselor is to show the Democratic voters in the Southern States that there is no hope for relief from what it calls "the oppressive domination" under which they suffer but from Democratic victories in the Northern States, and that these victories are imperiled by the continued hostility of the Southern Democrats to equal suffrage. In order that what the World calls "negro suffrage" is, it assures its Southern brethren, to strengthen the Republican party—which has at last a strong popular way of insisting upon justice and fair play. That party will prevail, says the World, until you appeal, at least, to arguments in equal rights and the settlements of the war.

Now certainly the contempt with which the World regards the political system founded upon equal rights should be evident enough to conciliate the most exacerbated of recent slaveholders. It is the most frequent advice which is that spirit. This notable "Democratic organ" has as much faith in the people as its friend CARL SCHURZ has, and also favors caution in innocent popular forms. It offers this advice to its brethren of the Southern States exactly to Mr. DOUGLAS when he offer his squatter sovereignty to the country, as a political panacea. "Let the people in the Territories decide whether they will have slavery or not." That remarkable "Democrat" did not mention that the people who were to be enslaved were to have no voice in the decision. So the World, as its Southern readers will see, does not ask them to appear to acquiesce in equal suffrage because it is just and American and expedient, and the proper conclusion of a fierce debate which ought to be forever settled, but only that they may acquire the power by means that equality and keep the question forever festering.

The World is regarded by many persons as an organ of the "Progressive" Democracy, as opposed to clinging to dead issues, and in favor of progress and new positions. But the plain fact is apparent to the Southern Democrats is contained in one sentence: "The Southern people would have no difficulty in managing the negroes if they were freed from white Radical interference exerted through the central government." That is to say, if the Southern Democrats will stop talking about a white man's government long enough for the Republicans to believe that they accept the situation, they will vote Democratic party can obtain power; and its Southern members may Kluxx the negroes to their heart's content, and the national Government will neither see nor hear. And this, which is the torriest kind of Andrew Johnsonism, is the platform of "advanced" and "intelligent" and "reasonable" Democracy!

This, moreover, is advice by which all loyal and honorable American citizens may profit. The organ of the "progressive Democracy" proposes that its party, once in power, shall permit what it calls "the Southern people," by which it means the exasperated ex-slaveholding class, to "manage the negroes" as they please. It proposes that the policy of its party that very non-acquiescence in the settlement of the question against the appearance of which, under present circumstances, it warns its Southern friends. There could be no plainer proof of what we have constantly reminded our readers, that the Democratic party acquiesces in nothing that has been accomplished by the war, and that it would regard success in a national election as express authority to reopen every question of reconstruction at discretion.

But, as we said, and as experience has proved, the advice of the World merely shows what its party will not do. It will not, indeed, relax its resolution of "managing the negroes," but it will not cease to protest against "negro suffrage," and to insist upon a "white man's party." It has never ceased that cry. It has never, as a party, pretended to acquiesce in the settlement of the war. And, as it believes it has grown steadily stronger notwithstanding that resistance, it will be led to persevere. The World's advice is serviceable only as showing that the Democrats who pretend to leave dead issues behind cling to them as tenaciously but more secretly than the others. The party is despotically ruled by those whom the World advises; by leaders whose policy in 1864 was submission to the rebellion, in 1868 repudiation and rebel ascendency, and whose sole hearty principle now is hatred of the negro. The necessity of giving such apparitions as the World offers is proof of the absurd fact that the Democratic party is what it has been for a generation—the relentless enemy of fair play.

SYMPATHY AND NEUTRALITY.

THOSE who deprecate American warmth of sympathy for France, fearing that the follies of the era of GENEET may be repeated, forget the essential difference of the cases. GENET came to this country as the delegate of the French Republic of 1793. The sense of the valuable and timely assistance of France during the Revolution was very fresh and vivid. She had now declared herself a republic, and she was at war with England while the bitterness of American revolutionary feeling against that country was unassuaged. In this country party spirit was intense, and one of the most powerful reasons of one party was the conviction that the other was really British and monarchical, and that its hostility to republican France was from ingratitude. The Federal party, therefore, hailed the coming of M. GENET with enthusiasm. That his conduct was really contemptuous of the United States was not remarked by them. That he openly despised the Government, and proposed to "appeal to the people," he called it, was forgiven by those to whom then, as now, the indulgence of party rancor was the highest delight. But WASHINGTON and HAMILTON withstood M. GENET. Even JEFFERSON was at last obliged to bow him down. The Jacobin masters of GENET in Paris soon after fell from power. He was then glad to return to his country, and, marrying a daughter of Governor GEORGE CLINTON, he passed the rest of his life quietly in the State of New York.

In the present war there is really but one party in this country as elsewhere. It is a war in which LOUIS NAPOLEON is on one side and the rest of the world upon the other. The large number of citizens in the United States of German birth naturally sympathize with their fatherland, and eloquently express that sympathy. Some of the leaders of the Republican party, with which they are identified, have declared their interest in the German cause and their ardent hopes for its success. But such sympathy is not party sense partisan. It is the instinctive feeling of all intelligent men. They perceive that this is really a war waged by LOUIS NAPOLEON for his own private personal interest, although under the name of France. And they acknowledge the simple truth of King WILLIAM'S declaration: "I am compelled to draw the sword to ward off a wanton attack. It is a great consolation to me before God and mankind." Hence in no way given a pretext for it. My conscience acquits me of having provoked the war, and I can confidently offer the righteousness of our cause in the sight of God."

The whole moral sympathy of the United States, therefore, is against the wanton breaker of the peace of the world. But we are, of course, neutrals in action, although not in feeling. For we have any thing else than reason illention. General BANKS pronounced against them in Boston. And Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS has declared against the forcible expatriation of coolies, while he is not opposed to honest immigration.

Mr. PHILLIPS and Mr. SEYMOUR agree upon one point, and that is, that the country does not want cheap labor, but skilled labor. That is true; and when we are told of the material developments in every where languishing for the want of labor, it seems to be forgotten that moral and spiritual development is still more essential to a nation. If five millions of laborers could be brought into the country to-morrow, because there is work enough for five millions more hands, it would by no means follow that it would be an advantage to the country. The problem of civilization is not going so easy as that. The considerations are many and complex. Thus the difficulty with the free-trade arguments is that the mutual exchange of the abundance of social and political laws are apparently forgotten. If the advantage of buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market were all that needed to be urged upon a country, free trade would soon be universal. The question to be answered is whether a country may not sometimes buy a greater advantage of another kind by buying goods in the dearer market.

Yet, in the discussion of the Chinese question, it must not be forgotten that one of the most progressive steps in civilization is the conception of the essential identity of men and races. The tendency of all modern scholarship is to reveal the unity of man, and unquestionably the true tendency of civilization is toward "the federation of the world." Merely to denounce Asiatics, therefore, as if to be an Asiatic were to be a kind of monster, or to disparage the Chinese as "pagans," as if an epithet were an argument, is to ignore the truth in the minds of all who know any thing of the actual civilization and moral code of China. Certainly we do not wish to import the follies of that country, nor to suppose that, in this time and in this land, any Chinese will of exclusive use be built. We may not build Confucian sagacity to defend American civilization from obliteration by that of Asia, without supposing it necessary to preach hatred and war for one of the chief human races, as if every individual of it were a nameless sinner.

It is very natural, from the passions already taken by leading men of all parties, that no vast Chinese current will be suffered to pour itself upon this continent. We should not ourselves upon a bald theory. Indeed, our Constitution already discriminates among the native inhabitants. It excludes Indians not taxed from the numerical basis of representation. To effect what is easily attainable under the circumstances, let us not have recourse to a crusade of sentiment against Asia.

NATIONAL UNITY IN WAR.

The London Times suggests that, as the war is a personal affair of LOUIS NAPOLEON's, which he is defeated, and especially if he should be superseded as chief of the state, the war ought to end. This is a curious proposition for a sagacious journal. For, however true it may be that personal considerations are really the secret of the eagerness with which a pretext for war was seized, yet, when hostilities begun, and a battle had been fought, and a nation had been inflicted, it was no longer LOUIS NAPOLEON—it was France that was concerned. French territory is invaded; French soldiers are killed and wounded and captured; French honor is touched; and, although an individual may have been the occasion of the invasion and the slaughter and the grieved honor, yet they all affect France, and France alone will attempt relief.

Mr. HENRY RAYMOND KAYE, in the London Nation, which is the most admirable and striking statement that has appeared of the feeling and attitude of Germany, speak of the war with men as "duped." A distinguished American statesman said that he could not help hoping that the war would end in the total overthrow of the BONAPARTE dynasty, but that he could wish no ill to FRENCHMEN. That is undoubtedly the general American feeling. But it is practically impossible for people to separate themselves from their Government, however unpopular it may be, when its action has promised the country itself. How instinctively a people unites to defend the soil and maintain the honor of a common country is shown in the action of Germany. LOUIS NAPOLEON counted upon a divided Germany, as our rebel chiefs counted upon a divided North in the late war. FRANKLIN PIERCE wrote to JEFFERSON DAVIS that the war would be fought in the streets of Northern cities. There were, indeed, plenty of Copperheads, but they did not divide the North. In Germany, Mr. KAYE says, the cities which were believed to be most unfriendly to Prussia have been the most ardent in their zeal for the war, under the lead of Prussia. "The Duke of Nassau declared that he would never receive his lands and crown from an outlaw like LOUIS NAPOLEON. This is the national instinct which makes the proposition of the London Times so impracticable. A country may wrathfully sweep away the man or the Government that has been the immediate occasion of disaster. But it will not rest until it has repaired the calamity.

After one great defeat upon either side, therefore, friendly intervention is hopeless. The terrible battle must proceed. That, indeed, is all that can now be distinctly seen. The prophets and speculations of a night are clouded by the facts of the next morning. The total defeats and disastrous humiliations of either campaigning in their own country would move so swiftly that they leave little time for comment. LOUIS NAPOLEON may go or stay, but the war will not end because of one tremendous defeat.

REVOLUTION PUT TO VOTE.

The demand of the "Left" in the French Chambers after the defeat of Haguenau was a main proposition of revolution. It was a demand that dethroned the Emperor in respect to city, and appointed a Committee of National Defense, composed of fifteen members of the National Assembly, which should be the supreme power, and to resist its decrees was to be considered a crime against the nation. It was as if, after the battle of Bull Run, the Democrats in Congress had proposed a committee to supersede the Administration. Such a proposal in a Chamber which is really Bonapartist produced, of course, the greatest excitement. CASSAGNAC and GRANIER DE CASSAGNAC swore, said that if he were a Minister he would send those who voted for it before a council of war. This, of course, unloosed every tongue. It was as if, after the battle of the Duke De Grammont, Minister of Foreign Affairs, said that those who demanded such a programme ought to be shot. Naturally, tolerable order disappeared again, and the President quaintly put on his hat, which suspends the session.

The proposition was rejected, however, that, since the Ministry must be sacrificed, as well as the General, to appease the popular discontent with a victim, it should be dismissed in the method pursued in constitutional countries, and not overthrown by revolution. But apparently it was a Bonapartist who virtually moved the censure upon the Ministry which the majority approved. Still pursuing the constitutional form the Ministry tendered its resignation. A new Ministry was formed, but more decidedly Bonapartist than ever. And the Constitutional form the Bonapartist system will continue until there is another defeat. A great disaster in the field would now be revolution in Paris.

NOTES.

It is significant that, while the reunion of the Roman Catholic Church culminates in the declaration of infallibility, a new reunion of the Jewish rabbis of various cities of the Union, held at Cleveland, declared most strenuously for faith and religious liberty. That Jewish declaration is, in distinction to the attitude of the Roman Church in this country, truly American. "Civil and religious liberty," say the rabbis, "and hence the separation of Church and State, are the inalienable rights of man, and we consider them to be the highest gems in the Constitution of the United States." They further declare that they "consider it our paramount duty to sustain and support the government, and to strive by all means, both public and by education, leaving religious instruction to the care of the different denominations." This is the true American view. It is the view of Christian declarations at Rome, and the long list of infallible anathemas which the Roman Church pronounces against the chief results of civilization and religious thought.

NOTHING could be more striking than the contrast between the attitude of the European governments and countries and our own. The President goes quietly to St. Louis upon some private business, while the leaders of the nations are absent for relaxation. The capital is deserted. Even politics are languid, and the spirit of the absence of any immediately engrossing question and of the happy national tranquillity is made, in the dearth of actual grievance, the occasion of absurd carping. But it is a fortunate country which, while other lands are agitated by questions so unworthy upon its way that those who are aching to find fault can only complain that the President is not consumed with anxiety, and that the Secretaries take a vacation, while taxation is reduced and the national debt steadily diminished.

Mr. VAN ARBERGH used to trust himself with lions, but Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS ventures among wolves. Certainly he is not a good hater, since he declared that he rather preferred those animals to Yankees; yet the other day he came to this Yankee city—for he meant to stigmatize all Northerners by that name—and, totally unharmed, sailed for Europe. He was unnoticed when here, and, although a few faithful Copperheads went to Northampton to shout in Jersey City to do honor to a man whose services to humanity and his country are infinitely recorded, he avoided their homage, and got quietly out of the country. The fact is signal evidence of the sagacity of the national feeling toward him. It has refused to make him a martyr. It has dismissed him to the inexorable verdict of impartial history. It suffers him to go with some contempt, if not unforgotten. So for many years ARON BURR walked the streets of New York unharmed. But he has not escaped history.

EVERY step of the Prussians in the war has been taken with serene carnestness. We mendened at the moment the immediate resolution of the Government to respect private property at sea, even under the French flag. This was luminous and very important precedent. But it soon followed by another measure of the same spirit. In a proclamation to the inhabitants of French territory occupied by the Prussian army, the King of Prussia states that, having been attacked on sea and land by the Emperor NAPOLEON, the chances of war have brought him, while repelling aggression, beyond the French frontiers. But he says that the war is against soldiers, not against citizens. The latter, while they are actively hostile, will be secure "as a matter of right," and what is taken will be paid for or a receipt given, damage determined by the generals. Prussia has thus far made no mistake. Her temper, her moderation, her resources have been most humane, honorable, and heroic.

GENERAL VON STEINMETZ.

General FREDERICK VON STEINMETZ, whose portrait we give on page 548, was born in 1796. He was sent to a military school at the age of seven years, and soon exhibited a decided predilection for the army. He was a little over sixteen years old when he was ordered to Berlin, and engaged in the city of Grossbeeren. Two years later he received his commission as Lieutenant, and was wounded at the battle of Dannigkow, fought with Russians at Konigswartha, where a ball took away one of his fingers, while another wounded him severely in the left arm. Next he was the ardor of his warlike temper that, although unable to walk, he insisted upon taking part in the battle of Leipsic, in May, 1813, on horseback. He fought in France in nearly all the engagements of 1814, and entered Paris with the armies of the allies. During the long term of peace which now followed, he studied military science in the Academy of War, and after advancing rapidly to the rank of Captain, he was soon after engaged in the battle of Wavre, fought between Austria and Prussia in 1830, on account of the Electorate of Hesse. VON STEINMETZ was ordered to Cassel, and afterward appointed commandant of the place. Although it was his earnest desire to participate in the second campaign in Schleswig-Holstein in 1864, he was ordered elsewhere, and had to remain content with inspecting the landwehr. In the campaign against Austria VON STEINMETZ commanded the Fifth Army Corps, and vanquished and dispersed three different Austrian armies opposed to him at the same incredibly short space of four days. Here it was that the Prussian soldiers first felt that they were considered as inferior to the Austrian, or rather Hungarian horsemen, proved that they were not only their equals, but in many respects their superiors. His triumphant victory at Skalitz, against forces by more than twice the numerical strength of the corps he commanded, procured for him the name, "The Lion of Skalitz."

Throughout the present campaign VON STEINMETZ did not meet with a single reverse, although he was often compelled to fight with the odds decidedly against him.

General STEINMETZ has already taken an important part in the war between France and Prussia. Under his command the movement against General BAZAINE at Sandwick was successfully made, simultaneously with the attack on the French at Wesenberg. General FROSSARD was completely routed.

M. VINCENT BENEDETTI.

M. BENEDETTI, whose interview with the King of Prussia on the public promenade at Ems in July became one of the decisive points of history, is of Italian extraction, and was born in Corfu about the year 1815. He was educated for the diplomatic service, he began his career at Palermo, as Consul, in 1848, and was promoted to the first Secretaryship to the Embassy at Constantinople. In May, 1859, he was elected his assistant, in the office of Political Affairs in the Foreign Minister, and in such capacity acted as secretary and interpreter of the Congress of Paris in 1856. On the recognition by France of the new kingdom of Italy in 1861, M. BENEDETTI was appointed Minister Plenipotentiary of France at Turin, which post, however, he resigned on the retirement of M. THOUVENEL from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He then (November 27, 1864) received his last, and, as it has proved, his most important appointment, namely, that of Ambassador at Berlin. Considering the angry feeling which has so long subsisted between the two countries, this appointment must be considered a mark of the Emperor's confidence in M. BENEDETTI's diplomatic talent, and, although on the first announcement of the HOHENZOLLERN affair great dissatisfaction was felt that the French Ambassador had allowed himself to be deceived, and cries were raised for his recall, there is no reason to suppose that he has suffered in the Emperor's good opinion, while, as to the people, he entirely recovered their good graces by getting involved. M. BENEDETTI was made Chevalier of the Legion of Honor in June, 1845, and, after passing through the intermediate grades, Grand Officer in June, 1860. We give his portrait on page 548.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE Kiowas and Cheyennes are reported as very threatening in the vicinity of Fort Hill, Texas, near Little Wichita, and in Cook County they have been driven back and carried several cattle, killing into captivity. Sixty soldiers were sent in pursuit, and followed them into the Indian Nation, but Indians attacked them, and a severe fight ensued, in which the troops were defeated and compelled to fall back, with the loss of two killed and six wounded. They were reinforced, and again pursued the Indians, but the latter had left. The rebellion of the recent election in North Carolina was small, and nothing serious is apprehended.

The Newspaper Press Telegraph Company, sitting at Salt Lake City, to discuss the question, "Does the Pacific railroad pay?" has left the people inclined, and designated Gevin Pratt to meet the doctor.

A large and very brilliant reception was given at Concord, New Hampshire, on the evening of August 11, in honor of the Governor, the Governor-elect, the supreme and other in a total expression.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE SITUATION IN FRANCE.

On page 548 we give a map of the seat of war in Europe, on which the movements of the hostile armies, from the battle of Weissenburg to the battle of Sedan, are clearly set forth. It is apparent that the Prussians intended to cut off the retreat of MACMAHON. Without any loss of time they followed up the retreating columns of MACMAHON and Failly, giving them no opportunity to make a stand at any position to the eastward of Sedan. On the 31st the Prussians had the whole host at bay on the north. Dispatches received up to the hour of writing state that MACMAHON was severely wounded in the engagement of the 31st, and that General Ducrot, who succeeded him in the command, was also wounded. The French army was immediately occupied. The French army was at Mezieres, Rethel, Rocroi, Sedan, Stenay, and Montmedy. The latter is a fortress of Toul, a fortified town of about 2000 inhabitants, situated on the left bank of the Orne, and about five miles west of Nancy.

The advance of the Prussian right, under Prince Frederick Charles, was not long repulsed. Forming a junction with the centre under the Crown Prince, on the 18th of August it occupied a position at Rezny, a station on the railroad from Metz to Longuyon, and thence to Briey, a station on the same railroad. The headquarters of King William were at Pont-a-Mousson. The Prussian army extended south and west of Metz. The utmost confusion appears to have attended the retreating movements of the French. The Fourth Cavalry Division is said to have lost all its supplies and impedimenta during a series of military operations in the environs of Metz.

On August 14 a battle was fought near Metz. Both sides claimed victory. The following is Napoleon's report to the Empress Eugenie, which must be an admission of a surprise, if not an apology for defeat:

"Yesterday, August 14, at 5 A. M., the enemy attacked our position in front of Metz with his whole army. Our set-to-once guard had no knowledge of the presence of any portion of military corps. The bulk of our army had crossed over the Prussians suddenly attacked the rear guard. After a fight of four hours they were repulsed with great loss to them. NAPOLEON."

King WILLIAM, on the contrary, in the official dispatch to Queen Adelaide, dated near Metz, Sunday evening, August 14, reports that

"A victorious combat occurred near Metz to-day. The troops of the First and Second armies fought against a horde to the extent of the conflict. WILLIAM."

The following dispatch from Prince FREDERICK CHARLES, dated August 15, at Pont-a-Mousson, before leaving Metz, issued the following proclamation, addressed to the inhabitants:

"On quitting you to fight the invaders I confide to your authority the care of the sick and infirm. You will never allow the enemy to take possession of this fortress of France, and I trust you will do so. I rely on your loyalty and courage. I shall ever remember with gratitude the kind reception I have met with here, and I hope that in more peaceful times I may be able to return to thank you for your hospitality."

Strasbourg has been closely invested. French advices of August 16 say that the bombardment commenced on the hospital of St. Helena, in the suburbs.

Paris has been put in complete order for defense, and the French journals announce it defies the Prussians. Because more than 400 cannon have been mounted on the forts which surround it. All the first houses in all the streets leading into Paris have been cut off, and barricades, ditches, etc., have been made. Sentinels are set outside the walls to connect and complete the network of fortifications commenced two years ago.

Count Palikao has issued an address to the troops, in which he says: "Soldiers, you will defend Paris as your fathers have done; they used stone bullets. In one day than the Prussians would in three days. The most eminent men in Paris, they tell me, are the grand line of defense from Thionville to Metz and Toul, and they have just told Marshal Bazaine back of that is the finest the Meuse; then that of Champagne; then that of Paris. Each of these lines is prepared for the campaign of 1814; and behind all this is Paris; and behind Paris is all France, with its resources concentrated men and a thousand millions of treasure."

The Corps Legislatif of France has convened in the French Corps Legislatif in Versailles. Before leaving Paris the Ministry issued a circular of the war situation, and a decree declaring declaring enlistment in the army, of which M. Gambetta made a severe attack upon the Government. This was applauded by the spectators, the galleries were cleared, and the debate was finished in secret session. The proposition was negatived by a large majority.

GENERAL FOREIGN ITEMS.

The telegraphic correspondence between General Le Boeuf and the home government with reference to reinforcements has been published. The General states that the losses from December, 1869, to July, 1870, were 8000, and by September will probably amount to 8000. It will require an equal number, he says, to replace those soldiers whose terms of enlistment expired; and, in all, 16,000 troops will be necessary to give the Spanish army in Cuba the same strength as it had in 1868.

From South America it is reported that a project for a Brazilian railroad has been formed by the Ministry, and that a preliminary treaty of peace with Paraguay has been signed. The Emperor, it is said, will soon leave Rio Janeiro on a visit to Lisbon.

PROCLAIMING INFALLIBILITY.

THE ceremony of proclaiming the new dogma of Papal Infallibility, in accordance with the resolution of the Œcumenical Council, took place on the 18th ult., in the temporary council-hall, which is the north transept of St. Peter's Cathedral. There was no procession or other pageantry, and very few spectators were present. Two or three hundred seats of the members of the council were vacant, many having been compelled to leave Rome because of the heat of the summer. The Pope having entered quietly and taken his seat, a mass was performed, and was followed by the Litany of the Saints, and the hymn "Veni Creator." The secretary to the council then read the decree announcing the doctrine of Infallibility, and the names of all the members of the council were called over, each father responding with "Placet" or "Non placet." This lasted an hour and a half, during which time there was a violent thunder-storm; the loud peals frequently interrupted the reading of the list, while flashes of lightning darted about the majestic building. When the record of the voting was taken up to the Pope the storm-clouds made it so dark that he could not read it without a huge wax taper. His announcement of the result was received by the assembly with a great clapping of hands and waving of handkerchiefs. It appears that 888 ballots voted for the dogma, 88 voted directly against it, 62 were in favor of it with some modifications, and 70 declined to vote. We give an illustration of the scene when the secretary was reading the decree from the pulpit at the lower end of the hall. The Pope is seen enthroned at the upper end.

CHAPTER IX.

IN BLOOMSBURY.

It was the evening of the day after Yorke had listened to his own biography, and the rain had long fallen upon the shivering woods of Crompton; the sun had heavily slow upon the west sky-light with thud and splash. It was a wretched night, even in town, where mud has sought out so many invincible ways to defy the scraper and the powers of darkness. The waste-pipes could not carry off the water from the houses fast enough, choke and gurgle as they would; the contents of the gutters overflowed the streets; and whatever gas-lights stood near were obscured as damp glimmer. In a large room on the ground-floor of Regent Street, Bloomsbury, a man was writing, and undisturbed by the dull beating of the rain without. She often raised her head, intermitted her occupation, and appeared to listen; but it was to the voices of her Past that she was giving heed, and not to the ceaseless patter of the rain. What power they have with us, those voices! While they speak to us we hear nothing else; we know of nothing but the one place; there is no Present at all; we are living our lives again. If pretty, we touch the better for us; if ugly, viciously, there is no end to the contaminating association. It is to escape this that some men work, and others pray. The furniture of the room was peculiar to the neighborhood: massive, yet cheap. It had been good once; but when? It came into the possession of her who now owned it. There was the round bulging lidded cage; the side-board so arranged as to suit a magnificent show of plate and tankards—only there were none; a horse-hair sofa, from which you would have sworn the intentions protruding had it not been for the continuous gloss, which no one ever could attain. Street, it shone on the other side of the way. On the mantel-piece were two of those huge shells in which the tropic deep is ever murmuring. Who that has taken lodgings in London does not know them? Who has not sometimes forgotten the commonplaces of his life in listening to those cold lifeless lips? If you take them up on their native tropic shore, they are full still of the roar of London streets.

There were no articles in the room, however, which were peculiar to itself. The one was a human skull—to all appearance, the same as all other skulls, the time of which you may not ask them, though it had once belonged to no common man. The second object could still less be termed an ornament than the first, although it was a picture. It depicted a woman of frightful aspect, having but one eye, and a leg of wood. She was standing up, and appeared to be declaiming or dictating—to an old cripple, at a table beside her, took down her words in writing. The cripple gave all over the rest of the house—and it was a large one—you would have pronounced to else remarkable, or which did not smack of Bloomsbury. It was, indeed, nothing but a lodging-house, and the room where he described was the private apartment of its mistress. She might certainly have own private taste, or second-cred, in her own room, else the skull and the picture occasionally rather shocked "the dignified sense" of the more lodgers, to whom the landlady gave audience in this apartment. She is at little like a respectable house keeper, to look at, or can be imagined. Her cheeks are firm and fresh-colored; her teeth white and shining, her eye quite bright, and her hands plump. To one who knows her age, as we do—she is fifty-three—she looks at least an old woman who has found out the secret of perpetual youth, but has kept it for her own use, as, in such a case, every woman probably would do. There is not one piece of deception in her appearance; her black hair, which clusters over her forehead like a girl's, is dyed of that color: it is in reality as white as snow. By lamp-light, as you see her now, she might be a woman of five-and-twenty, so strong is her color. But she is, in fact, writing to her son, Dr. Jack Yorke. Writing to him, but not thinking of him, surely, when she frowns as now, and leans back in her chair with that murmuring of angry look. No; her anger is not directed against him, although he has left her and home, long since, upon an adventure of which she disapproved.

"You will gain nothing for yourself, Richard," was her remark; "and, perhaps, you may even say seamy fortunes." But, as we know, her son had taken his own way (as he used to do), and had so far prospered. She was writing a reply to the letter she had received from him from Crompton that very morning, and which she was one that naturally evoked some bitter memories.

"So he put him in the cheap chamber, did he?" they ran on. "Ay, that was my room once. What a pretty chime that serpent-clock had; and how often have I heard it in the early morning as I lay there—alone! If it had not been for that hateful woman, I might have been listening to it now! He seems as mad as ever, by Dick's account, and, I do not doubt, as brutal and as selfish! And yet it was he that suffered, he that was wronged, he that was to be pitied! His wife was the adversary, fortunately! who deserved all she got. Oh, these men, these men, that treat us as the playthings, because they are so sure of sympathy, even from our fellow-slaves and sisters!"

She bent again to her occupation, but only for a minute. "All this is labor in vain, Dick," muttered she, laying down her pen; "the luck is gone both from you and from me. If I were thirty years younger, indeed, and might have my chance once more, I would tutor you myself; but it ought to have beaten his meek-faced mother out of decoy: it ought to have frightened his dull eyed girl to work my will with him. She should have been my accomplice, and not hers; but, now, what boots it that old age has become me? Yonder is the only woman!"—she looked toward the picture—"who has found a way to use her own kind, save as their toy. My reign has been longer than that of most, but it is over." She rose, paced, holding on by the table, and then sank, in a mocking face, in the round glass. "And this was once fine and handsome, was it? Ay, and her face, and this her figure. No drunkard, staggering home through such a night as this, could look to have a worse. Well, I am not sorry, and better for me had I lost them with all the rest than I should not have been what I am to a bitter! And a future she must once have had before her, if she had but known what men were and are for! The only view she ever seemed to have discover what they have missed. This mad world is made up of fools, and those bright eyes and the fool Yorke, except in his wild words, as plant as a hazel twig. I used to think yonder woman a fool, because she was nothing but a piece of tormer; but she was right there. Yes, Joanna," she continued, apostrophizing the picture, "I'm ashamed to confess that you are right; for, being in hell, it is idle to deny its existence."

She placed the lamp once more upon the table, yet did not seat herself beside it, but walked backward and forward in the room. "To be among so more, to be poor and powerless, to have no hope in the future, and to be haunted by the fear that even belief in one's self—is not that to be in Gehenna? I am punished for my sins, men say, and perhaps I have. But why am I punished? Why is he pound, and strong, and prosperous? Why is the gentleman-lodger above-stairs so now, my soul would be as pure as snow beside that man's? my soul beside most men's! Joan! Joan! I know how she—I speak by imputation for how she should she? What's that?"

Amidst the pitiless rain, the window had increased within the last few hours rather than diminished, the pulling of the house-bell could be heard. It was a single, sharp, and peculiar—as jeweled trinket of exquisite beauty, one of the two-edged sword of the galaxy lamp. "Dick, mistake," she murmured, "and all the lodgers are within. Who can it be?"

The bell pealed forth again.

She went into the hall, where the gas was burning, and unlocked the door. At the same time something was thrust between it and against it, but the chain was up.

"Who is it?" inquired she; and it was strange, at such a moment, to hear how very soft and musically she spoke, although, when among her household, she was, indeed, but hen harsh and bitter as her mood.

"It is I, mother," returned the voice from outside.

She unhitched the chain, and let him in.

"Jack!" she said, "Jack! Jack, surely."

Richard was pale and haggard, and shone from head to foot with the rain, which poured off his water-proof coat in streams.

"You were right, mother," said he, as he kissed her cheek; "I am unfortunate. But let us have food and fire."

She trembled at his socks and slippers, made a cheerful blaze, and set cold meat and spirits upon the table.

He ate voraciously, and drank his hot brandy-and-water, while Mrs. Yorke worked busily at an embroidery-frame.

"You are not disappointed at seeing me, that's one thing, mother?"

"Yes, I am," said she, coldly.

"You have the pleasure, then, which your dear friend always has never enjoyed of seeing your own prophecy accomplished: and I, for my part, have the disappointment of failing to satisfy with for what has certainly been a disappointment."

"I am glad you are so philosophic, Dick. It is the best thing we can be, if we can't be religious. How did it all happen?"

"I scarcely know the plot (for there was a plot), but only the dénouement. I had offended Yorke, and he had offended me, and there's all."

"Jack, you are so philosophic, Dick. It is the best thing we can be, if we can't be religious. How did it all happen?"

"Yes; you were right again, mother, there—the whole affair is a tribute to your sagacity; if you will add a request to mention it to him as I say that this fellow Eane, when walking with his patron's brother, stupid Jack, had me pointed out to him in town one day as the man who had "pulled him through," as he called it. Can you imagine how even such a fool as he could have been so mad? It was as act of suicide, which, so far as I know, fools never commit. Well, Eane was pretty certain of the identity of your humble servant, which he was, moreover, anxious to establish, because I had beaten him at pool, and given him the rough side of my tongue."

"Oh, Dick, Dick! have skilfull hand and ready speech been only given you to make enemies?"

Richard laughed, and lighted a cigar.

"Well, sometimes, mother, the most prudent of us are carried away by our own genius. I am told that even you, for instance, lost your temper upon a certain occasion down at Crompton—gave a piece of your mind' to my father, which, it seems, he took as a sample of the whole of it. There, don't be angry: the provocation, it must be allowed, was in your case greater than mine; but then you are a woman, and have our self-control! However, this Eane did hate me, and told the Yorkes that I was a gambler; the good parson and my friend, however, and all might have gone well, but for this oaf—this shut Jack—coming down to Grace's in person. He could never get any coin out of 'Fred,' as it pequins, by letter; or, perhaps, he couldn't write. But there he was in the big drawing-room when I went in last night, and Grace saw his jaw drop at the sight of me. He had not the sense to shut it even afterward, though I told him he had made a mistake. He could not even choose. I could have persuaded him, indeed, out of his own identity—and much more nose—only that he appealed to Grace, and then the game was up. I would have made me laugh had I not been so savage. Grace turned to both out of the house together. He left a trunk would not permit him, it seems, to harbor us. So Jack and I found ourselves in the street, and I have not parted the best of friends this morning. But I'll be even with that fellow Eane—yes; by Heaven, I will! It is a score of years hence!"

Perhaps the light satire tone which the young man had adopted throughout his narrative was little in accordance with the feelings which really agitated him; but, at all events, his last few words were those of the bitterest hate.

"Be even, Dick, by all means, with every body," observed his mother, coolly, "but do not indulge yourself in revenge. Revenge is like a game at battle-dore, wherein one can never tell which is the battle-dore and which the ball."

"At the same time, it is one of those few luxuries which I should have least to lose cast behind," said Richard, with the air of a moralist.

"It is not cheap, however, even to them," returned Mrs. Yorke, still busy with her autumnal work. "It may cost one one's life, for instance."

"And what then?" inquired Richard, carelessly.

"Nobody knows 'what then,' Dick. One fanatic yonder had one opinion; our philosopher there" [she pointed to the skull—" another. Both of them know by this time, and yet can not tell us. It is the one case where the experience of others can not benefit ourselves.

This subject had no charms for Richard. When we are young we vulgarly called "in the sulks," and displeased (if we were to own it) with the whole world, and more particularized in this world, the next seems of but little importance. There may be a miscarriage of justice (that is, a false estimate of our worth) even there. Perhaps Mrs. Yorke was aware that her son's disposition had not portend religious or metaphysical speculation, for she abruptly changed the subject.

"And what are you going to do, Dick, now that this Crompton plan has failed?"

He did not answer, but stood with his back to the fire, moodily smoking his silken moustache.

"Richard"—she rose, and placed her plump white hand upon his shoulder—"I am sorry, very seldom that I ask a favor of you, but I am about to do so now. Promise me that you will never attempt to injure Yorke in any way, or to interfere for this man Chandos."

He laughed, but had laughed before, in bitter fashion. "Why not? It was fifty pounds down: and apparently no risk: that is, no risk from the law, which has omitted to provide for the contingency. Next to being above the law is surely to be beyond its reaches. I am really a public benefactor. Without my help, the estate would already have been deprived of the services of four young gentlemen of the Inner Temple bar. Of course, such a calling has its disadvantages. It is very difficult to obtain clients. The offer of one's valuable assistance is liable to be declined uncivilly—it requires the talents of a diplomatist to convey it delicately—and, after all, I possess those talents. Again, undoubtedly the profession is in bad repute, our never be permanent: but then, has not one been especially favored in the affair my mother's model? Shall I not be a boy again without a guardian to bother? The idea of you being fifty-three, mother!"

As they stood together side by side it seemed, indeed, impossible that this young man could be her son, far less the offspring of her middle age. She smiled upon him fondly, putting his handsome cheek. "And is my Richard so full grown a man," said she, "as to flatter, and not to scold? I was impossible to imagine a more winsome voice, or a more tender tone.

"No, mother, I will promise, if you please, said the young fellow, kissing her. "And now, let us divide this Crompton spoil together." He pulled out his purse, and counted the contents. "There is Carew's three hundred, a few pounds I won my game, and Yorke's IOU for twenty—worth, perhaps, five. Come, we two are partners in the game of life, you know, and must share alike.

"No, Dick, no," returned his mother, tenderly; "it is enough for me to see you win." She shut the purse, and forced it back into his unwilling hand. "Some day, I trust, you will sweep away a great stake—though not as you gained this."

"Ah, you mean an heiress! You think that every woman must needs fall in love with me, because you have done so, mother."

His rage and bitterness had vanished, as though by magic; her tone and touch had spirited them away.

"Perhaps I do, dear. Go to bed, and dream of one. You must be very tired. I ought not to say that I am glad to see you back, Dick; yet how can I help it?"

CHAPTER X.

OVER THE EMBERS.

It was one of the peculiarities of Jane Yorke that she took but little sleep. The household had long retired, and she put the remains of her son's meal away with her own hands, then sat down by the fire, thinking. She had more subjects for thought than most women; her life had been eventful, her experience strange. We know what her second husband—the man who repudiated her and her child—had been and was. Her first husband had been scarcely less remarkable. Leonard Yorke was a specialist of respectable family, and of tolerable means. His patients were dead, and his relatives and himself had parted company early. They were sober, steady people, connected with the Irish trades: a share in their house of business at Birmingham, carried on in the name of his two uncles, was the only tie between him and them, save that of kindred. They were strong Unitarians, strong political economists, strong in their rugged material fashion every way. They did not wish him to do with a nephew who was a religious zealot, and thought all the world was out of joint; and Leonard Yorke unofficially sought consolation in the advertising columns of the Times. Mr. Unitarian Yorke generously bought himself a having a specialty for the reduction and reform of refractory young gentlemen, and they had considerable success in his establishment. It was the best thing that they could think of—for they were genuinely conscientious men—since they not grudge the money, though the tutor's terms were high. Jane was then a very young girl—a very young, child, that parents of themselves would scarcely have taken alarm had they been aware of her being beneath the same roof with their impressionable charges: and she was childish-looking even for her tender years. Leonard Yorke, gentle and good-humored, soon moved with compassion toward the orphan girl, as guileless-eyed as a seal in a picture; he pitied her poverty, and, what is more, the wretched character of her uncle and her surroundings. She was a lovely specimen of the spiritual matters which engrossed his being, and yet so willing to be taught. She sat at his feet, and listened by the hour to the beginnings of his level talk. If he did not understand them, she was in no worse condition than the rest. His tongue was fluent. His words were like a lambent flame, playing with some indestructible material. His mind was weak, and tended to mental and moral speculations—mysticism: the aroma cubebia of Swedenborgianism. Writ to him. He believed in three heavens, and their reciprocal Ave's endeavors were directed to make him believe in a fourth heaven. Childlike and innocent as they appearance, she was in character exceedingly precocious. Her intelligence was keen and practical. Even at thirty years it had not dwindled into her that her future welfare would depend upon her own management, and she never forgot the lesson. Her uncle was very generous to her; but he was not the man to have saved money for her self-styling. If he had paid any, and for less for his niece; he spent every shilling of his income. His wife Jane would secretly have preferred to receive in hard cash the sums which he lavished upon her in indulgences; she would have dispensed with her pony and kept a steed in the stable for herself of another sort. The time was not certain to come some time or other to her, and she would have laid up some made provision for it—a difficult matter for most of us, and for her who was penniless. She was wise enough, even then, to know how Uncle Hardcastle would have received any suggestion of a matrimonial character at that time of day.

In Leonard Yorke, if she did not comprehend his doctrines of perpetual subsidence, she perceived a provision for her future. At one-and-twenty, indeed, he made his pupil his wife, to the astonishment rather than the wrath of the neighborhood. They opined that it was only in order to keep a family secret, and perhaps, in proxy, that brides ran so young. Jane Hardcastle, however, was in reality eighteen years of age.

Yorke Brothers, of Birmingham, had nothing to say against the match, but they objected to a Swedenborgian partner in the iron trade, and bought their nephew at a fair price out of the concern. They did not offer to receive back again, when, five years later, he became a true believer in the Church of Joanna Southcott and the coming of the young Shiloh. Uncles lady, whose partner, with that of her spiritual amanuensis, knew well. Mrs. Yorke's attempts that the "affinity" between them was Platonic; but they had not strongly grudged the money with which he had so lavishly relieved the "perplexities" of "the handmaid." The amanuensis used to issue Vaux bail at Joanna's decisions, and with enormous interest Hereafter, and Leonard Yorke was always ready to discount her paper. There was no one that subscribed more munificently than he did toward the famous "cradle," or looked more devoutly for its expected tenant. Even when that long-looked-for 19th of October had come and gone without sign, and two months later his poor deluded idol passed away into that future with which she had been so rashly familiar, he was faithful to her yet, and kept the "seal" which she had given him—his passport to the realms of bliss—as his dearest treasure. He had scarcely any other "effects" by that time, for, actuated by his too fervent faith, he had been living upon the principle of his fortune; and at five-and-thirty years of age Mrs. Yorke found herself a widow, with a stock of very varied experience indeed, but not much more of worldly wealth than she had had to start with. It was hard, after half a lifetime, to resume the same semi-relative, semi-dependent position under her uncle's roof which she had occupied before; but no better offered itself, and she was glad to accept it. Her external attractions were still wondrously preserved to her; and, perhaps, on the occasion of her second nuptials (and the fact of her first so excellently concealed), her age excited less astonishment than her youth had done in the former instance.

Yet now at fifty-three, this woman, as remarkable for her talents as for her beauty, and who, if but for a brief period, had once been the "fortune's crowning slope," found herself with little beyond a bare subsistence, which was precarious without gratitude from the hands of Carew. What she derived from her lodging-house defrayed the somewhat lavish expenditure of her son Richard. She was far, however, from complaining of his extravagance. She wished him to live like a gentleman, and not to soil his hands with ignoble pursuits. She felt a genuine pleasure—only known to mothers—in gathering proudly together what she knew he would lightly spend. She was for the present amply repaid by the reflection, that her Dick was the handsomest and well-appointed a young fellow as was to be seen in London, with an air and appearance that would become a prince. It was only a question of time, she thought, when the princess should appear, be captivated, and raise him to the station for which she had taken care to fit him. In the mean time, it was only natural that she should enjoy himself after the manner of other youth of great expectations. She was not averse to his dissipations, for in them indeed lay the best chance of getting acquainted with young men of his class; and, so far, had she been disappointed. It would be surprising to many a stately patrefamilias to learn how easily acquaintanceship, and even friendship, is contracted over the bowl of sparkling, if they be among the pleasure-seekers of the town. A young man of gentlemanly exterior, with plenty of money in his pocket, does not require introduction. The club door soon flies open to him, but not that of the home. Richard was on tolerably intimate terms with Chandos, and other young men of the same class —but he had never been introduced to their sisters. It was here that Mrs. Yorke made her mistake: she should have also understood that, where she had studied two exceptional phases of it. There is nobody more short-sighted than the Bohemian. It imagines he is a true citizen of the world; his round of life may have no fence in the shape of convention, yet it is often very limited, and it is outside every other.

Mrs. Yorke judged of all men by her knowledge of her late husband and of Carew, of all women by herself. If it had not been for the artificialities of society, she would have had the right; but they are powerful, and she knew little about them. In some matters she was exceedingly sagacious. She did not overrate her charms, which would have been felt by some mothers with respect to her sons, probably exposed to some danger by his modes of life; perhaps she had not their scruples; and yet it is strange to see how light those scruples weigh in our severest matrons, when any question of "position" is in the other scale: they will not only permit their sons to herd with every class which they are persons of distinction, but even accept them for their son-in-law. Mrs. Yorke, her daughterless, had no temptation to commit this latter crime, but she was not displeased to imagine her Richard a man of gallantry; he would in that case be less likely to fall a victim to undeserved charms. "It is not your innocent girl who sacrifices his future in a love-match," was her reflection. On the other hand, no one knew better than herself what an easy prey to designing wiles is a young gentleman without experience. It was for this reason, as well as because she loved to have her boy about her, that she had opposed Richard's going to Middlenhire. She knew Carew too well to hope that he would ever ask him to favor a son of hers, and she distrusted the country, with its opportunities for ensnaring youth into matrimonial engagements. Three years ago, in a fortnight of village life together, she would have backed herself to prevent the promise of marriage out of the Pope; and she did not believe this to be one of the lost arts among young persons of her sex.

Thus Mrs. Yorke had strained every nerve to get the necessary funds to make two-pile pieces out to her son, and yet she had not succeeded. It was not so much that he found his allowance insufficient, for he had various means of supplementing it, one of them (at which we have already hinted) a strange one enough; but which his mother had caused him to receive in Londesrape-quaintly furnished him with an excuse for wandering. She had had him taught to sketch, because it was a likely sort of accomplishment to aid the scheme of life which had planned out for him; and he had taken up with the art more seriously than with any thing else. But it was not in Richard's nature to apply himself with assiduity to any pursuit. Such callings as lay within his means and opportunities he was incapacitated for by education and temper. He could not have occupied any subordinate position that required respectful behavior—submission to the will of a master. He had had to put the greatest restraint upon himself during his brief residence at Crompton, and it was more than doubtful if he could have maintained his position there as a dependent in any case. He was gentle and good-humored, genial and agreeable, when pleased; but he had that personal pride which is as stubborn as any haughtiness of descent, and infinitely more inflammable. It was no idle brag when he told the Crompton chaplain that he would give up with injustice than no man (if he could help it), and would repay his wrong-doer sevenfold (if he got the chance). His sense of right was very strong, and instinctively, also, respected himself. All his passions were strong. Much of this he had inherited as the son of any young gentleman of position accustomed to have his own way: hats of spirit (who can afford it in his pay) with high mettle; proud gentlemen in moments of exhilaration may even pitch into policemen; and generally, with respect to temptation to offend, much is forgiven. The danger in Richard Yorke's case was that his position was far from assured, and that he had some things which might prove great obstacles to his ever reaching it. He had all the quickness and impetuence of one born to fortune, without the money.

Mrs. Yorke was too wise a woman not to be acquainted with her son's character. Her love for him was very great; as great as, sometimes, rested as that with which the most religious and well-principled of women regard their offspring; but it did not blind her to his faults. Her experience of life had not led her to expect perfection; her standard of morals was of very moderate height, and Dick came up to it: yet she felt that her son was headstrong, impulsive, and occasionally unscrupulous. He was not her own line in respect to his dealings with Chandos and with others, in spite of her urgent entreaties. Her opinion, though, was unheeded, indeed been so strenuous that the subject was a sore one between them, and she had therefore, when less palpable, she would scarcely have ventured to revert to it that night. She had done so, however, and carried her point. She had made her word to her that he would undertake no more such hazards, and she loved was a guarantee for her's. He was aimless and indolent; but as a mean man, who brings himself to perform some act of importance, will perform it thoroughly, or a selfish man, "when he is about it," will be all self-congratulation; so, when he had made up his mind, his determination was rock. Mrs. Yorke then felt sure of her son so far, and rejoiced so in it. But she was not deceived as to his other accounts. Perhaps, notwithstanding her assertion to the contrary, she may have had some vaunty hope of her son's future with Constance; or perhaps his wanted it placed before her for the first time that there was another side to the social path. Were the times really gone by which she had known, whereon personal beauty, and youth, and gaiety, were the only gifts that went to any height? Or did she misjudge her own daughter, and was not so sure as to the other? Her Dick was still very young; but his appearance should surely have done something for him even now; yet hitherto it had done nothing but friendships of doubtful value, one of which, indeed, had all but ended in disaster. Of the infinitely more unpronounceable; or rather, such was her estimation of her son's attractions, that she thought he had only to be seen by the right people to become the magnet of every female heart. Had he been so, altogether in her plan for his future?

As she sat over the dropping embers of the fire, while the ceaseless rain lashed against the pane without, a terrible vision crossed her mind. She saw her son—not the lavish in my with dissipation and excess, prevish and fretting for the luxuries which he herself, old and decrepit, could not longer procure for him. She even found a voice reproaching her as the cause of their common ruin: "Why did you not, my son, woman when I should have been corrected? Why did you bring me up to beggary, as though I had been a prince? why have taught me nothing whereby I could now at least earn my daily bread? Why did you let me lavish in my youth the money which, frugally husbanded, might now have supported us in comfort? Why did you do all this—you who were so beautiful and so worldly wisdom?" For a moment, so great was her mental anguish, that she almost looked for age —not that the picture had any terrors for herself, but upon her son's account alone. She may not have been particularly fond of looks, etc., but her heart was full of another's woe, and had no room left for one selfish regret. She had (in fancy) ruined both; but it was only for that Dick that her tears fell. If the guardian angel, which is said to watch for every one, were one of us, had not given up his disappointing vigil at poor Mrs. Yorke's elbow, a tremor of delight that turned him limb and wing. Very passionate in the Great Day, when all our plans shall be scrutinized, whether they have been good or not, this poor, impotent, fallacious one, which worldly Mrs. Yorke had formed for her son's future, will stand, perchance, when others which accounted themselves better to human eyes were toppled over because built on the rotten foundations of self. There will certainly be many worse ones. She did not propose to sell her offspring, as match-making mothers do, to avid bidders. In her doting thought her Dick would make any woman happy as his wife. At all events, right or wrong, judicious or otherwise, her scheme must now be adhered to: it was too late to take up with any other. The vision of its failure had foiled away, and she could think on the matter not with her usual calmness.

The gray dawn creeping through the shutter-chinks found her thinking still; but ere the dull, dismal day of reckoning life were heard above stairs, and before the coming of the sleepy, slatternly maid to "do the parlor," Mrs. York had arrived at her conclusion.

The early main prime, she was wont to say was always her brightest hour, but it found her, on the present occasion, white and worn, not with her long vigil, but because it was "borne upon her," as poor Joanna used to say, that her son and the most part for his own good: so soon as the spring should come she would bid him go. London, where all was prudence and constraint, was no place to win the bride she sought for him. He should go forth into the country, where his heroines were still gentle, and win her, as troubadour of old, but with sketch-book in hand instead of harp. Not a promise—no, one might say; but then, what schemes for a young man's future, who has no money, are promising nowadays? Moreover, it could be said of it (as can not be often said) that, such as it was, her Richard was by nature adapted for it; and—though this was a less satisfactory reflection—was adapted for nothing else.

LOUIS II. OF BAVARIA.

King Louis of Bavaria, who was at one time supposed to be nothing more than romantic, not to say silly, worshiper of the composer Wagner, seems to have succeeded in shaking off the boyish fancies that once blinded him to his true career, and to have taken the manly position which the head of a nation should occupy. Following the example of King William of Prussia, he has taken the field at the head of his Bavarian army, which is marching on the siege of Strasbourg. The portrait which we give of him on page 548 shows a rather youthful face, but one not incapable of manly determination.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

It I run up an account with great ease, can any one tell me how I can run down?

An intelligent youth, recently engaged in a commercial office, made out a shipping bill for "fourty barrels of flour." His employer called his attention to an error in the spelling of forty. "Sure enough," replied the pronunciation," I let out the ph."

At a marriage ceremony in Wickford, Rhode Island, lately, the groom became impatient during the extended prayer, and interrupted the clergyman with, "Elder, sin't that bout enough?"

A certain old Scotch woman, remarkable for her devotion and a friend of hers of the same kidney, William Hill, were arguing widely, and disturbing her own and her neighbors' devotionalities. At length the Jacobite, a brawny body, brought his dear hand heavily upon the table, and roared at his adversary, "I tell you what it is, sir; I quit upon your King William." The friend of the Prince of Orange was not to be outmastered by mere lungs. He arose and repeated back to the Jacobite, "And I, Sir, quit upon your James the Second." Jerrold, who had been listening, broke in upon the silence, hammer and the bell and shouted, "Waiter, spittoons for two!"

A story is told of Lord Carendon, who entered on one occasion a restaurant in the Palais Royal, to dine on a single bouvreuil. Having ordered a frugal meal, he called for a bottle of Champagne. The waiter, anticipating the customer might not be able to settle, demanded the price was twenty-five francs a bottle, to which he put an end to his lordship's extravagance. "Oh! in that case," said the latter, "bring me two bottles."

Sorrels isn't my thing now. There is an older woman's club than that—the broomstick.

In a Hoosier court a witness, being asked how he knew certain persons were man and wife, replied, "Why, dog on it, haven't I heard one woman scold to my house?"

"And so you have married a Mr. Penny," said a gentleman to a lady of his acquaintance. "Yes—Mr. Penny." "Ah, you have done better than I thought."

ON THE BEACH AT LONG BRANCH.

General Grant ("Listening to the breakers' roar"). "Well, this is Refreshing after the Fatigues of War!"

At Oxford, England, some twenty years ago, a tutor of one of the colleges limped in his walk. Stopping one day last summer at a railroad station, he was accosted by a well-known politician, who recognized him, and asked him if he was not the chaplain at the college at such a time, naming the year. The doctor replied that he was. "I knew it," said the man of politics, "and I know you by your limp." "Well," said the doctor, "it seems that my limping made a deeper impression on you than my preaching." "Ah, doctor," was the reply, with ready wit, "it is the highest compliment we can pay a minister to say that he is known by his walk rather than by his conversation."

A little boy three years old, who has a brother of four years younger as a reason for the latter's good conduct: "Baby doesn't cry tears because he doesn't drink dirty water; and he can't cry ashes."

A man telling about a wonderful parrot hanging in a cage from the window of a house which he had often passed, said: "But I cries 'Stop, thief!' so natural that every time I hear it I always stops."

A young bachelor says that women's hearts are as brittle as glass, and a man who wishes to marry one of them must use diamonds, or he will not be successful.

Hints to Bathers.—Unless you are staying at a very fashionable spot, it will not be necessary for you to undress in a bathing-machine; but if you are rich, and if you have a great deal of time, do not take your watch with you. Persons who are kept away from dining just will find gum shoes serviceable during the bath; and if the ocean is so fierce as to make you afraid to go in theatres, a limp dress will be nice to have along to protect your suit. If you are afraid of sharks, you can get a shark-proof suit with bright buttons that have hundreds of eyes; it can be had while you are at dinner; but it will be found a little heavy in the water, especially if you forget to take a little lead along in a hermetically sealed sardine-box. If there are indications of a freshet in the ocean, it will be best for not to go in at all. If the water is very cold, the newest plan is to drive yourself nearly mad by a pair of heated, nerve-throw off your bathing clothes suddenly, especially if there are ladies in the vicinity. It will be prudent to take a bar of soap in to bathe with you, as you will find it convenient to wash with when you have returned ashore. Diving for the Atlantic cable, so as to send the message, "Mother, I am safe," is one of the wandering places. If you get too far away from shore, and find yourself sinking, it will be prudent to write all your affairs on a piece of paper, and send them to the document to a stone and throw it ashore.

A victim of unequaled affection concludes as follows:

"I eat me down and thought profound;
I ate me down and slept.
It's easier far to like a girl
Than to forget a girl like you."

"I am afraid, Sir, you are in a settled melancholy," said a sanitary to a miserable-looking lodger. "No, madam," he replied, "I am afraid you will find it settle-like your collee, it has too much grounds."

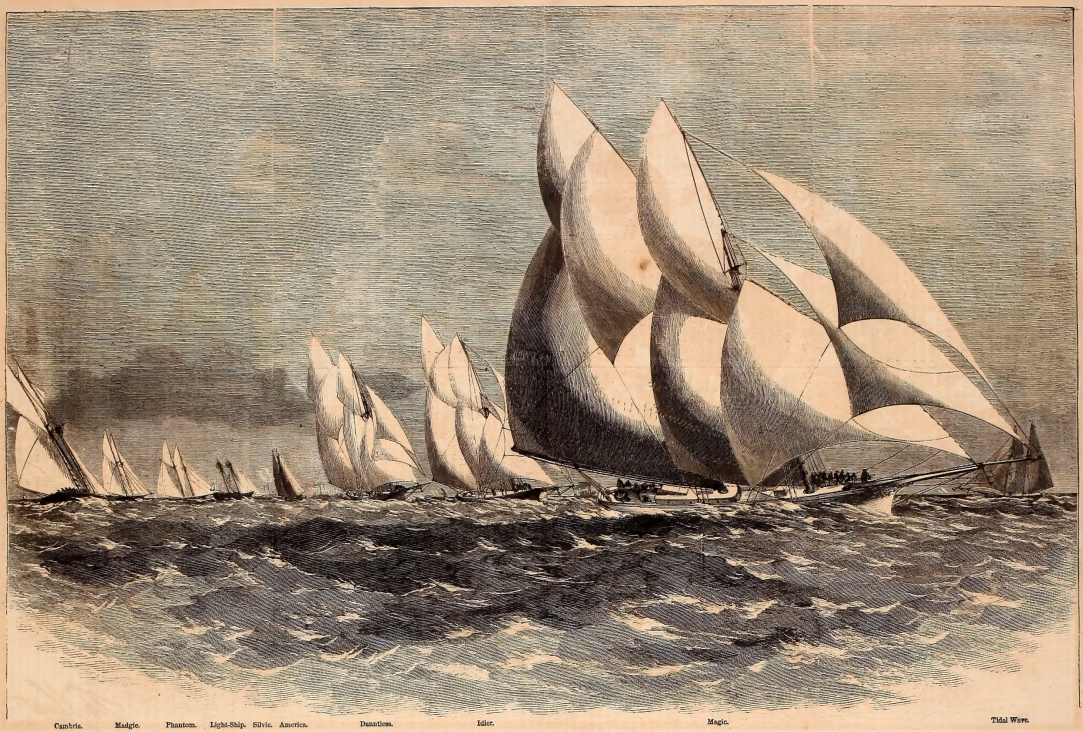
The man "over-lored" was an editor.

"WHO GOES THERE?"—"A FRIEND."



THE RACE FOR THE QUEEN'S CUP—ROUNDING THE LIGHT-SHIP.—DRAWN BY CHARLES PARSONS, FROM A SKETCH MADE ON BOARD A. S. HATCH'S YACHT "CALYPSO."—[SEE PAGE 554.]

THE YACHT RACE.

OUR illustration of the Yacht Race for the Queen's Cup, on page 553, shows the winning yacht Magic on the home-stretch, after passing the light-ship, which is visible near the extreme left of the picture. She leads the Idler by several hundred yards; and directly astern of the latter vessel is the Dauntless, which eventually overhauled her and came in only five minutes behind the winning yacht. At the moment chosen by our artist seven yachts had rounded the light-ship ahead of the Dauntless, namely, the Magic, the Idler, the Dauntless, the Ariadne, the Silvie, the Phantom, and the Madgie.

The race was the most exciting one ever witnessed in American waters. The bay was covered with steamers and sailing vessels of every description, and it is estimated that the contest was witnessed by over a hundred thousand people, whose interest was heightened by the fact that among the contestants for the prize were the celebrated yacht Ariadne, the winner of the International race of 1851, and the Dauntless, which has just won the ocean race with the Dauntless. The Magic, one of the handsomest as well as one of the fastest yachts in the bay, made the race in about three hours and fifty-eight minutes.

THE FIRST AND LAST THEFT.

WHOEVER has seen the tragedy of "Romeo and Juliet" as presented and represented on the stage has had the opportunity of a divine pleasure. I have always wondered what they who would be when exalted by the touch of music, with singing melodies evolving from that undercurrent of sweet harmonies on which the actors should flow along—as if a God who had moved among us, mortal, suddenly assumed His godly shape. Yes, as it is, or ought to be; when the orchestra breathes a festive strain, and Juliet, in southern beauty and passion, sheds a light from the stage as she moves along her stately dance, with Romeo standing spellud upon her grace, and the nurse hovering round her, like a hen around a blossom—when the night garden glitters with dew in all its great shrubs and flowers, the fountain showers its spray, the vases overflow with heavy flowers, and a low moon sends out silver upon the lovers, meeting and parting there —it needs no other enchantment than its own.

It was to witness over all those charms of love or both 'in, my discreet play, that I doubted one night at the door of a certain theatre whether or to go in or not. Singular, it was that I should have hesitated that one night of all nights, for it decided the whole lot in life. Yes, it was it were, on a toss-up; and yet, so much are we the puppets of destiny that what seemed to me then the merest whim of chance must have been, in reality, an event as fixed as fate; for it was there that I made acquaintance with Desgrieux.

The play was superb. But, in spite of that fact, my eyes were continually attracted toward two of the audience. In the pit sat an old gentleman stiff and stately, with a gray mustache, and some foreign orders worn over his threadbare coat. By his side was a young, slight girl, whose intent countenance reflected all the changes of the play.

The first time I noticed the rose on her bosom went and came; now a laugh displayed pearls of teeth and a hundred dimples, now a tear in large dark eyes tears gathered, and hung on long, backward-bent lashes, ready to fall. This lovely little beauty was perched in the gay seat beside the old her heart and soul, that more eyes than mine forgot to watch the shifting acts to watch her face. She leaned forward, forgetfully, her chin resting upon her hand, and, in so doing, revealed, what seemed almost a marvelous wealth, her unnerved chain attire—a bracelet, which must have been a costly and artistic one, but which, in its apparently a chain of Genoese beads, long enough to encircle the ivory wrist twice and hang loosely in a great loop the third time; each bead was a filigrane miracle of spun gold, a hollow globe, so fine, so thin, so delicately wrought, that it seemed a mere bubble of light; and each one—as I had the opportunity to observe on getting it into my own hands later—a fantastic combination of open flower's corolla, with all its petals springing open to the sun, or half closed over his gold and the honey of its heart. I had once seen a necklace of the same miraculous beauty on the neck of one of our well-known singers.

Nobody knew any thing about these two, ask as I would. It seemed impossible to find any means of making their acquaintance. And my disbelievers in love at first sight I am a living contradiction, for I declare that I loved that girl passionately from the moment I saw her. Such instances have been known to me since. How could I get acquainted with her? That was the question. To do so I was fully resolved.

I forgot all about the closing play. Leaving my place, I went where they must necessarily pass me in coming out. She was leaning on the old soldier's arm, and her face was close to his. The throng around pushed. My foot stepped on the hem of her dress, drawing it back a little, and she put down her hand to release the skirt. The loose coils of the bracelet fell nearly over the glove; I touched it adroitly, and it slipped off and was hidden in my hand. She passed on, unconscious of the loss.

I am not a thief, but a gentleman of position; though, so far, appearances are certainly against me. They must have found out the loss and advertised it at once; for the next morning there it was in black and white. Tearing open the paper with some trepidation, lest I should have done the work too well, and have a real theft on my hands, I saw the announcement. After all, who would lose an object like that and not seek to regain it? The finder of the bracelet was to apply at No. 7 Vanley Place. and would be handsomely rewarded. I intended to be handsomely rewarded.

I went at mid-day. Having improved the forenoon by a vigorous investigation of the history of the inmates of Vanley place, number seven, and found that the principal resident was the General De Rochejequelein, a soldier of the ancient régime, who had crossed the water under the heavy hand of the Emperor Napoleon. He had dropped the aristocratic "de" the more thoroughly to assimilate himself to his poor condition, and lived in obscurity on the daughter on the remnant of a wrecked fortune.

A French lady—and I am sure that I probably one who had accompanied them in their banishment. She took my card and began to speak familiarly in her broken English of mademoiselle's loss at the theatre the previous evening. It was in mademoiselle's bedroom, where she had the chance of the least divertisement—and for it to have been married by this mishap was sad to pity. Saying so, she threw open the door of a sitting-room, and addressed the general in their own tongue.

"Monsieur arrives concerning the bracelet of Mademoiselle Jaqueline."

Mademoiselle Jaqueline sat before the fire, embroidering a wonderful piece of lace—I became well acquainted with its fine stitch of work afterward. The general—it was the same old stately man—put down a newspaper to take my card. The young lady looked up with a haughtily cold color and expectant face, rising as she did so, and remaining by now with a most distant and haughty courtesy that was as irresistible as it was demure. Not to neglect my opportunity, I first made an opening for conversation by expressing my appreciation of the lost bauble, in order to identify it.

"Mademoiselle Rochejequelein," said the stiff old general, rising also, but with an easy air, as he took the obelisk could have given, and sing very favorable English, "is in the habit of various trinket her bracelet, as it was an heir-loom. An heirloom."

"That is," said a voice musical as running water, "it was left to me by—by mother. She used to wear it."

There was already a certain free friendliness in her words, although her manner was polished and distant, as if she were in the habit of the fact she would have kept from another. I have described since that hall, all unconscious that I recognized the affinity that existed between us, and would have chosen words more reserved had the leader been my friend as myself.

"May I ask you to describe this article?" I said again.

"A chain of graduated filigrane beads, Sir; gold, of course," struck in the general with military precision, "and remarkable for its peculiarity. It was wound three times round the wrist. Either the finder must be an adroit thief or—when—I say with a thousand pardons, monsieur—ten thousand pardons!

"Do not be sorry, sir. Pray proceed."

"I would say then, that Mademoiselle Rochejequelein—"

"Very serious, papa," she said, sweetly. "I confess that I do not remember its slipping over my hand. I—you see, monsieur, I—I—I—well, I remember turning, too," she added, "and seeing no one seated near who could be considered suspicious." And she put her handkerchief, saying on her cheek, as it shifted to and fro, in order to give me a better opportunity.

"Sir," I said, "Mademoiselle Rochejequelein is not to be blamed; although, as I am the lucky finder, I am pleased to say that I am the most ant predicament of your 'adroit thief.' I am fortunate in the discovery and have afforded me the occasion of meeting with General De Rochejequelein, of whose valor and distinguished actions I have heard so much. I am also pleased to say, in common, permit me to say: Madame Rosalins and Judge Wentzer are, I believe, both well known to you. I am happy to be the means of saving the bracelet, mademoiselle."

And I laid the beautiful chain still. If I passed it to the General I should lose the warm touch of those little hands, the glance of those eyes. Instead of it, I appealed to the superior authority of the General, I gave it to his daughter, and in the end I got—both. The General had the bracelet; and Jaqueline went on with her work.

I felt, even at that early period, that I could serve for her as long as the patriarch Jacob served for Rachel, if I got her at last. But the General invited me to a seat. My notice of his valor had gratified him, and brought the blood to a cheek which was already flushing with the color; my mention of the two mutual friends we mentioned in common, whose acquaintance-ship with himself I had discovered by accident, and the name on the card I had tendered, stamped me, in general, as a man of the world worthy of his friendship. Meanwhile, I had done them a service; I must have a glass of wine and a cracker with him. The old soldier—monsieur they called Noisette, served it with the deference which he would have paid a prince. I took to them the honor of calling again, the General said; and he would be proud to wait upon me at my house.

He did wait upon me; I did call; and this happened to be the day on which I was to receive our first young Jacqueline. Sometimes the pretty creature came in and vanish; pop and vanish; or she would enter on her mother and myself with the glass of wine and cracker, and then disappear altogether. The time passed. I grew more intimate at the house; she less shy.

Sitting there one day with the General, her face-work frame standing near, wanting its materials, I took the opportunity of scanning the exquisite embroidery of leaf and flower, beginning to run riot in their white wilderness there, and, as I myself many hand with seeming carelessness, of setting half a dozen stitches backward.

"Pronez garde!" said this practical old fellow. "You will do a mischief!" and then he plunged back into the advance of his column, which he had been detailing.

I called the next morning to leave a book that the General had desired to borrow. Mademoiselle Jaqueline was alone in the room when I was announced by the old domestic. She answered me the General would descend in an instant. Mademoiselle always treated me in a familiar manner, as if possibly I might aspire to an equality with herself, but in a quiet way that any other of my countrymen could ever meet her master and mistress on a footing. It is a way and a belief that she has to this day.

Mademoiselle Jaqueline's greeting had all the friendliness of a sister, and, immediately after I returned it, she resumed her work in silence. Then I sat with my book in my hand, ever, and so little, the corners of her mouth to bury themselves in dimples, the pearls to gleam; and finally, as she bent over the heavy pearl of hughter, like the light-hearted, sweet child she was.

"Why did you take such a mischief in my work?" she said. "Why did you snarl my thread, and pucker my net, and spoil my rose?"

"Pardon me, mademoiselle, but instead of making your escape this morning, you might be obliged to stay and explain to me why, Mademoiselle Jaqueline," was my bold answer.

Mademoiselle drew in as if resenting it. The dimples went away, and the mouth grew grave.

"I must tell you, monsieur, that you are not in touch yet with me," she said. Then, after a little silence, in which she blush had chased another across her cheek, she went on in a lower tone. "Monsieur, I will tell it!"

I don't say the avowal did not give me a shock. I certainly had wondered at the constant, unwavered watch of that beautiful embroidery, but I had never thought of this. Ideas whirled through my brain. I was rich; could I not—but—but it would never have done. All to do now was, not to let her see my surprise.

"And remember, monsieur, that you are in my touch yet now," she said. Then, after a little silence, in which she blush had chased another across her cheek, she went on in a lower tone. "Monsieur, I will self that this was the damsel of that night of flowers—that I had whispered sweet words to her—that I had held her in my arms. It was impossible to believe it!

A score of these little scenes, these oscillations and vibrations—to-day a sunbeam, to-morrow an icicle—when one afternoon, just as I was finishing a brief visit, the General was summoned to the door below. I stood, looking from the window a moment, not liking to go down just then, and exchanging no word with mademoiselle, when a pleasant little murmur struck my ear—Jaqueline was singing to herself, as if there were not another soul in the room, and though half under her breath, yet with a voice as rich as that of a flute. Then, as I was only a sir from the opera that we had heard together. I turned; and, going down the room, staid before her mechanically.

"Tell me, mademoiselle, what it is I have done to offend you."

She looked up for a moment, intending to be severe and dignified. But it would not do. The lips pouted and quivered, and there came the old pearl of laughter.

"The small cousin marries next month," I whispered.

There came a blush like a crimson rose. The head bent low over the embroidery; and—the General came back again.

Some days went on. Mademoiselle's movements were variable as the weather. My constitution would not stand it longer, and I determined to put my fate to the test.

She still sat behind her lace frame, like a fixture; tracing, as exquisitely as a winter's night traces them on the pane, her pattern of vine leaves and wild roses there. The General had gone out this day, and I came in. I had been greeted with an inclination of the head, a simple sentence, and then silence. I went to the rose and wormed myself before the fire. I sat, at the other side, one step away. But the inclination of the head had given a little more color to the hair that had loosened as she bent over her work; down it all came, falling round her like a veil. She lifted her two hands together to put it from the face, over which a flush was streaming like an aurora; and I stood before her.

"How long do you imagine I shall put up with this, Mademoiselle Jaqueline? I hope you suppose I can live under a sky so variable; this hour, June—the next, January? Inconstant, it is to be all summer—to you have given the diamond upon it!" and bending across the frame, I kissed her, very warm mouth.

She grew as white as she had been rosy; her head fell forward; I thought she was about to faint, and threw down the frame and took her in my arms. But she only hid the white face there, sobbing out—"Forgive me! I am nervous. Forgive! I had thought for so long that—it was the—small cousin."

"But I told you it was not. She marries the husband of her choice. She is like my sister."

No reply. Only the face hidden from me.

"You are a goose, mademoiselle." And the sweet face was got to at last.

"Monsieur," said the General, when it was all explained to him, after he had entered to find us side by side, in the ruddy glow of the evening fire, "I like not the idea that I am to have, myself, after all, wide stole my daughter's bracelet."

"Well, Sir! And now?"

"And now you have stolen her heart."

STRASBOURG.

THE city of Strasbourg, now besieged by a German army, is a strongly fortified town in the department of the Lower Rhine, 437 miles by rail from the capital, situated at the confluence of the Bruche and the Ill, and about half a mile from the Rhine, which is crossed here by a wooden bridge. The town, of which we give a view on page 545, is built in a plain, is very regular in form, and divided into several parts by canals or branches of the Ill, over which there are a number of bridges. The houses are built chiefly substantially built of stone: many of them have steep roofs, and two or three rows of dormer windows running across them. Of the streets, some are wide and straight, but the greater part are narrow. It is surrounded with extensive fortifications works about six miles in circumference. The citadel on the east side of the town, built by VAUBAN, is a regular pentagon, composed of five bastions connected by curtains with ravelins and outworks extending almost to the Rhine.

Of its public buildings the principal is the Cathedral of Notre Dame, founded in 1015, and justly classed among the most perfect and beautiful specimens of Gothic architecture that exist. Its tower, which is 466 feet in height, and the loftiest in the world, is a master-piece of architecture, being built of hewn stone, cut with delicacy as to give it at a distance some resemblance to lace, and combining the utmost elegance and symmetry of form with perfect stability and construction. The west front is ornamented with carved work and statues, and the interior is decorated with stained-glass windows, and contains a stone pulpit of exquisite workmanship. The astronomical clock in the nave, which shows the changes of the moon and the seasons, is a master-piece of mechanism. The other churches, among which those of St. Etienne and St. Thomas and the Temple Neuf are the most remarkable; the old castle of Strasbourg, the town-hall, the episcopal palace, the court-house, theatre, several hospitals, tribunal of commerce, public library, the residence of the prefect, the academy, custom-house, a school of artillery, a cannon foundry, an arsenal, several markets, and monuments to GUTENBERG and Generals KLEBER and DESAIX. It is a bishop's see, and the seat of a chamber of commerce. The manufactures of Strasbourg are flax, hemp, wine, spirituous liquors, linen, sailcloth, blankets, carpets, hardware, leather, cotton, lace, snuff, jewelry, buttons, cutlery, clocks, chemicals, mathematical, musical, and other instruments. It also contains numerous copper and iron works and soap factories, and has a large trade in books. Population, 82,014.

Strasbourg is a place of great antiquity, having existed as a Roman station prior to the Christian era. Its strategic value has always been the scene of military operations in the present age. It is the birth-place of General KLEBER, Marshal NEY, and others, and of Professor GUTENBERG, said to have been one of the inventors of printing. By means of railways and canals it is connected with the chief towns and great rivers of France, and with the Danube, by which means its commerce is greatly extended.

THE FORTRESS OF METZ.

THE French town of Metz, a strongly fortified place d'armes, within and around which the French army is now encamped in considerable strength, is situated in the department of the Moselle, about 170 miles east of Paris, at the confluence of the river Moselle with the small stream. It is connected with the capital by railway, and is an important point in the line of defensive operations which the Prussian victory over Marshal M'MAHON, at Haguenau, has forced upon the French.

The Porte des Allemands, or Gate of the Germans, of which we give an illustration on page 545, is one of the seven gates of the town. It is the aspect of a strong-hold flanked with towers, and has a massive appearance of considerable antiquity. This gate was constructed in the fifteenth century, as is attested by a Gothic inscription and the date 1444 which it bears, and is a curious specimen of the military architecture of the Middle Ages. Against the gate of the town which is shown now defended by Bellefort, the Emperor CHARLES V. principally directed his efforts in the year 1552.

The arsenal of Metz is situated at the eastern end of the town, between the gate and the road of Bellecroix. It contains many objects of interest—notably the Salle d'Armes, containing 60,000 muskets, from 30 to 40 pistols, and a great quantity of other arms. This arsenal is a vast establishment. Large numbers of arms are fabricated in the work-shops, and repaired by millions of men. It formerly contained a curious cabinet; most of its casemates were to coleslaw with arms, which was captured by the French in 1790, and which was remarkable for its rich ornamentation, as well as for its antiquity. This is now in the Museum of Artillery at Paris.

WASP LIFE.

THE life of a wasp is by no means monotonous: even in her cradle the future character is foreshadowed by the sharp mandibles with which she is supplied, and the different shapes of these she ventures on the dangerous journey up the walls of the cell. Her duties are very various: each parcel of her life has its own duty, and is adapted to her condition. The relation in which the mother stands to her young is very peculiar. She differs from the queen bee in being to the others their mother rather than their queen. Her history is very like that of the workers, but in general outline: like her they build, collect food, and tend the larvæ; and like them she has her very peculiar circumstances, they lay eggs. The first change that comes over the mother wasp is in her capacity to make paper. This is a very remarkable depending on the activity of the salivary glands, seems to be given to her, as to the workers, by the instinct of maternity. When the workers brood has begun to appear, and they require the better part of their food of the day, the decreasing labor of feeding the larvæ. She restricts herself henceforth to the lowly, material occupation of paper-making, and to the care of the interior of the nest. Broad after brood successively emerge from the cells she has spun, replacing the older wasps, which, with advancing age, become incapable of making paper. This a constant supply of material, and as the nest grows which have no longer the faculty of house-making. Thenceforward she is the head of the household-keeping: and, while the large young wasps, in full glandular vigor, maintain and enlarge the nest, the older workers supply the Chinese Empire ment in satisfying the hungry mouths which peer out from the lower surface of the comb.

LISTENING WITH THE TEETH.

LISTENING with your teeth may seem a comical action, but it is a possible one, and, after all, no more unnatural than to listen with the ends of fingers, which every educated mute can perform. Any one who will hold a vibrating tuning-fork to his head will be surprised at the unexpected thrill that goes through his head, and the superior intensity of sense in his teeth while it was experienced when the fork is held to the ear. That other nerves than those appointed for audition are capable of being affected by sound-waves in the brain is thus pretty evident. We had remarked this so often that we were fully prepared for the evidence to a statement made by a newspaper correspondent to the effect that a deaf friend was stirred with delight at the music of a violin rendered audible to him first by placing the instrument between his teeth while it was played upon, and afterward by means of a string tied to the violin, whereof one end was held in the musician's mouth. The writer in question suggests a repetition of his experiment upon a larger scale, with a number of strings stretched from an umbrella or sounding-board to the mouths of a deaf audience. A concert of such character might be a ludicrous affair to sharp-eared spectators, but we venture to think with the proposer that the experiment would be far more gratifying than absurd to those who, for the first time in their lives, were thus moved by concord of sweet sounds. Let us hope that curiosity, if nothing else, will prompt a trial by those who have charge of the deaf in this country. As our inventive times go, we ought not to be backward in attacking any problem for the alleviation of bodily suffering or the restoration of natural conformations. We make the lame walk and the deafness by, and of these two maladies the last is said to have been one of the inventors of printing. By means of railways and canals it is connected with the chief towns and great rivers of France, and with the Danube, by which means its commerce is greatly extended.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE severe drought which has prevailed this season in every locality, and even in certain sections of our own country, has induced several scientific men to speculate on the likelihood of the rainfall which will be called artificial means. If this matter can be thoroughly investigated, and made so practical that we may obtain rain at pleasure, the crops need not be so uncertain as they are now. To be sure, a grand difficulty lies at once: no two farmers would ever agree as to have the rain come—though the potatoes of the one be perishing, and those in the lap of the other would be spoiled by a shower. And who would settle the matter? We suppose, however, an appeal to the ballot would decide the most important questions.

It appears that M. Le Maout, a chemist of St. Brieuc, has made many experiments on the use of sea-water, as often caused by the concussion of air produced by a cannonade. During the siege of Sebastopol the concussion in Britany was affected, notwithstanding the six hundred leagues which lay between. It is to experiments that he could tell before the news arrived when fighting was going on, because the concussion of the sea produced a distinct white line on the beach. The day these became overcast, and a drizzling rain would soon fall, frequently followed by heavy showers of snow by wind. This chemist also cites other instances in which the sea-water has been influenced by a cannonade of battle. He suggests that it rain in desired at Paris, there should be a cannonade with mortars, and the barometer should mark less than 76 centimeters. The cannonade should then be begun not at Paris, but at Charbourg, where the instruments for producing the concussion of the best time would be in the morning, before the thunderclaps of war in the west should begin. Batteries of batteries should be fired simultaneously, at short intervals; and if this cannonade were to coincide with some religious festival, requiring the bells to be rung, the effect would be all the more certain.

A military commission at St. Petersburg is actively engaged in selecting a breech-loading rifle which it is proposed to introduce into knapsacks. A French doctor has well described the circumstances under which, by means of a simple piece of mechanism, can be brought under the fire of the enemy, and to serve at the same time as a breast-plate for the soldier and a rest for his rifle.

A new revolving cannon, capable of firing forty rounds a minute, is largely hinted at in Paris.

About one thousand students are connected with the University at Bonn, on the Rhine. Seven after war was declared by the French number presented themselves before the authorities, and asked that they might be instantly enrolled in the defence of the fatherland.

A Paris banker received from a Berlin banker a remittance of 4,000 francs; and when the worried: "The other 24000 will be due next month; I shall bring it with me myself." He received as good as his word in rest in this reply: "I will endeavor to ameliorate your captivity by all the means in my power."

Kentucky can boast of giants almost. A Mrs. Hoskins, residing in Hopkinsville County in her seventy-sixth year. She was six feet and one-half inch in height, and weighed over two hundred and seventy pounds. She was the mother of ten children, all but one of whom lived to maturity, and whose average size was six feet in height. Seven of them are yet living, the tallest being only six feet ten inches high. She has twelve brothers and sisters, all of whom were over six feet. Her husband was six feet and four inches high.

The Legislature of the Seminole Indians have just passed a decree which is supposed to be an indication of the progress of "civilization."

About one hundred gentlemen of St. Louis have just engaged permanent rooms in the Mercantile Library, for none house-servants into their families. The negotiations have been made with the Union Benevolent Society in San Francisco. They have agreed to pay them good wages, and to afford them all necessary protection during the term of service.

Frank Thorn, alias Matthew D. Carpenter, recently made a perilous leap in Buffalo from the roof of a four-story building, to escape a deputy. He broke his shoulder in the fall, and was dragged into a cell by the officers. The distance from the roof from which he made the leap to the street was about forty feet. A hundred and forty-five feet by actual measurement. Not less than twenty thousand persons assembled to witness this remarkable feat. The young man, who is about twenty-five years of age, seems to have grown up without any knowledge of fear, and from childhood has been noted for daring deeds, which have often endangered his life. He can walk the ridge-pole of any factory, and for a part of the distance down kept on erect position: and, to the astonishment of the spectators, he gracefully stood forward, and at last struck the earth on his right side with a tremendous concussion. Boats and various contrivances were at hand, and within one minute he fleetly he was dragged into a boat. The shock to his system was terrible, and for some time he was thought to be near death. Though now considered out of danger, he will probably be a long time in recovering his health.

Since the death of M. Prévost-Paradol many facts have come to light which indicate with much certainty that self-destruction was the result of a fit of insanity. It appears that for a long time the unfortunate Minister had been troubled with apprehensions of suffering of the brain, and had contemplated with horror the possibility of living a life bereft of reason. He had received medical treatment in France for this threatened malady. His daughter communicated the fact, after his death, that he had for some time lived in dread of insanity from softening of the brain; and the circumstance that his wife had died insane weighed heavily on his mind. The priests were brought in requisition against robbers, it being his custom to keep them in the bottom. It is believed that when he retired to bed that last night he had no thought of self-destruction, but that the host oppressed him greatly, and that he woke suddenly, feverish, and possessed with the idea that he was insane.

The directors of some of our city railroads have received a very opposition from certain citizens—namely, to put upon their lines a number of palace-cars for the use of any one who is carry a certain number of passengers, and who are prepared to be satisfied with a handsomely cushioned easy-chair, or an entire apartment, if willing to pay for it. An extra charge of 50 cents will be asked for each passenger occupying a table. There is no reason why some such experiment should not be tried. The present crowding of cars does not render economy very body unacceptable. Those who can afford it pay for comfort want it, and are willing to be gratified. Certainly there are a great many who would gladly pay for some protection to have a comfortable seat to themselves during a long ride.

Louis Kossuth feels himself too old and broken and nervless to come before the public as a lecturer. Some months ago the Boston Lecture Bureau commissioned a celebrated lecturer to travel through Europe until he found Kossuth, and, if he was reported that he was poor, to offer him a series of lectures engagements with tyrannize in the United States. The commissioner proceeded upon his duty. Upon reaching his destination, he expressed his determination to speak no more to public when he was in his own country demanded it. Kossuth was found in a small quarter of a city in Asia Minor.

It is a pleasant theory to tender-hearted anglers that the wriggling of the bait on the dry land is not indicative of agony but of comfort. It has been taken from the water where there is but little room into the air where there is a good deal of it, and feels just as a person does when he has been laughing.

"The pavements are all kissing hot, the sky above is brazen,
And every head an egg is dead the sun can set his eyes on;
The lofty, jerk-looking skeletons go striking pale pair through the glare,
Their feet, without trying-pans, send hotter fancies to their brains."

So wrote S. F. Willis once—so might he write again had he lived in the "heated terms" of this present summer.

Twenty years ago an adventurous youth, by name Charles Gouriet, left home and friends in France to seek his fortune in America. Nothing was heard of him for three years beyond this, that he had gone to Mexico. A stranger lately arrived at Medellin, came to this country and sought every where for his countryman, but all in vain. Still he did not wholly give up the hope, and settled in Colima and was charge of a French newspaper in that city. A few weeks ago Thoughts that he was wounded in the assault at the arrival in Chicago of Red Cloud and his chiefs on their way from Washington. The same day a interpreter accompanying the party struck his attention, it being the manner that of his friend. He went to the room of an interpreter; but the interpreter had already gone to the hotel. Gouriet, however, detected a resemblance between the two, and Thoughts of his friend to that child's dominion in the hope of meeting there his brother, who had three years ago became enamored of the wild Indian life.

A gentleman, passing by a humble hovel in Buffalo the other day, heard a child crying bitterly a short distance away, and, seeing that nobody came to the rescue, stopped to the door and listened an old lady that one of her children was crying outside, adding that it had probably hurt itself badly. The tired mother looked up from her washing, in a tone of wild exclamation, observed: "My good gracious, man! I've got so many children that I can't keep the run of them suppose to cry. It's enough for me to know that I've got children enough to cry." The man then found that the woman had eighteen children, fifteen of her own and three adopted. Eight of the youngsters all but one of them by gardening, washing, and ironing.

What magic there is in a titled name! Nothing ago a stranger from the city of Mexico arrived at Panama just in time to hear the signal given, and to see the train quietly pulling off. With an authoritative voice he shouted on the guard, "Stop! Lord Lisford's coming!" Instantly the sleepy-eyed conductor roused himself, the engine to speed, and moved back to await his lordship's arrival. Meanwhile the stranger quietly stepped into comfortably seated himself in a third-class carriage, and then, putting his head out of the window, informed the guard that his lordship had entered, and he might move on!

It is a fact interesting to all lovers of shad that Salmon Creek, a stream near which that poet passed in the Connecticut River at Holyoke, Massachusetts, until the dam was built in 1849. Since the completion of the present season an unusually large quantity of this delicious fish has been taken from the creek, a result naturally brought about from the 40,000,000 young shad which were placed in the river three years ago.

The southern extremity of South America can lay claim to possessing the most novel post-office in the world. It consists of a small barrel, fastened by an iron chain to the outermost rock of the mountain overhanging the Straits of Magellan, opposite Terra del Fuego. Ships passing that way can drop letters through the straits, either to place letters in it or to take letters from it. No postmaster is needed; seamen take care of the little receptacle, and no breach of trust has ever occurred. Every ship that passes understakes to transmit the contents of the barrel, if the destination of the mail matter is within the limits of its voyage.

Suicide assumes a pocketist aspect abroad. A gentleman recently drowned himself in Lancashire, near Bolton, leaving a note: "You will find me in the brook," and concluded with poetry, thus:

"I shall be at peace in a shaky nook,
And all sorts of banks flowing brook."

CHRISTINE NILSSON.

THIS charming singer, who is soon to appear in this city, was born in the pretty and retired village of Hossaby, picturesquely situated among the lakes and forests of Smaland. Her father, a small farmer, possessed a great taste for music, and was the chief chorister in the church of the district. The Diva's birth, in 1843, increased M. NILSSON'S already numerous family to eight, all of whom were more or less musical, especially one of the sons, CARL, who was by profession a violinist. Little CHRISTINE, from her earliest years, gave great signs of vocal talent, and was found one day by CARL, secretly practicing on his violin, which, unknown to any one, she had taught herself to play. Admiring her dexterity, CARL determined to utilize such precocious talent, and the child subsequently accompanied him to the various fairs and entertainments which he was accustomed to frequent. At one of these former amusements—the fair of Ljungby—a Swedish magistrate, named THORNSENHELM, was so struck with the splendid voice of Mlle. NILSSON that, after making inquiries, he offered the parents to educate and entirely provide for the child—an offer too advantageous to be rejected.

Mlle. VALERIUS, afterward Baroness de Lenhusen, a singer of no mean repute, having heard CHRISTINE sing at the THORNSENHELMS, undertook to give her lessons, which still further developed the powers of the sweet but uncultivated voice of the little peasant. Shortly afterward CHRISTINE was sent to school, where she remained two years, at the conclusion of which she was removed to Stockholm and placed under the tuition of M. FRANZ BERWALD, a talented composer and master.

A sister of Mlle. VALERIUS, a portrait-painter, being about to visit Paris, invited the young girl to accompany her, an invitation which was eagerly accepted. There she resided with an English family, and became a pupil of M. WARTEL, under whose guidance she remained three years, when, after much doubt and hesitation, she resolved to go on the stage. Her doubts, which arose entirely from timidity, were finally dissipated by witnessing an unequaled performance of Madame CARVALHO in "La Reine Topaze" at the Théâtre Lyrique, and an engagement for three years was procured for her at the above theatre, her salary being but 2000 francs for the first year, 2500 for the second, and 3000 for the third.

In October, 1864, being just twenty-one, Mlle. NILSSON made her debut as Violetta in the "Traviata," but did not obtain the expected success, the opera being entirely unsuited to her character, as even now the fair Swede is much more at home in a prophète than a bridal. In the following February, however, she had her revenge, as a perfect furore was created by her personation of Astrillammante in the "Flauto Magico," and was afterward most enthusiastically received in "Marta," "Sardanapalus," and "Les Bluets." She did not succeed so well, however, in "Don Giovanni," her Northern nature being far too cold for the correct representation of the passionate and jealous Elvira of the South. In 1867 she first appeared in London at Her Majesty's Theatre, and made her debut, as in Paris, in the "Traviata," having long and carefully studied the part under M. DELLE SEDIE, a professor of the French Conservatoire. In the same year she sang in "Judas Maccabæus" at the Birmingham Festival, where her immense success obtained her an engagement for the Crystal Palace Handel Festival of the following year.

COUNT DE PALIKAO.

GENERAL COUSIN-MONTAUBAN, Count De Palikao, the new French Minister of War, to which position he was called in consequence of the disasters to M'MAHON and FROSSARD, was born June 24, 1796. He went to Algeria at an early age, distinguished himself as an officer of cavalry, and, after more than twenty years of uninterrupted service, was intrusted with the command of the Tlemcen Division, and finally with that of Constantine. Recalled to France, he was for some time at the head of the Twenty-first Military Division. In 1860 he took command of the French expedition into China, and had the honor of accomplishing the almost marvelous invasion which carried the flags of France and England to the capital of that empire. The destruction of numerous Chinese forts, the splendid victory at Palikao, and the entrance of the allies into Pekin, forced the Chinese government to accept of a treaty imposed by the allies. Returning to France in July, 1861, he was made Senator of France, Count of Palikao, and Commander of the Fourth Army Corps. In 1860 he had been forty-two years in active service. We give his portrait on the next page.

A WRECK.

SILENTLY, mournfully, to and fro,
The long waves wash under thee;
Rocking thy broken and battered prow,
Threatening to sunder thee.
Helpless and hopeless—no one to care,
Though a storm shatter thee;
Only the cold rocks, white and bare,
And the pulsing sea, so false and fair,
And the distant boats that have left thee—there,
And the calm sky, watching and wondering where
The winds may scatter thee.

FARRAGUT.

ADMIRAL FARRAGUT, one of those rare men to whom it is given to "read their history in a nation's eyes," died at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, at noon of Sunday, August 14, in the seventieth year of his age. His father, GEORGE FARRAGUT, was a native of Minorca, and early took to the sea for a livelihood. Coming to this country, he served in the Revolutionary army, and at the close of the war settled near Knoxville, Tennessee, on lands given him by the government in part payment of his services. Here DAVID GLASGOE FARRAGUT was born July 5, 1801. His first name was given him in honor of Captain DAVID PORTER, an old friend of his father's, and afterward a famous naval officer. The middle name has been supposed to be a family name dear to his Scotch mother.—Through the influence of DAVID PORTER young FARRAGUT, at the age of eleven years, was appointed a midshipman, and, as the Naval Academy was not yet in existence, he was ordered to get his schooling aboard ship. His first cruise was made in the famous Essex, and his first commander was Commodore PORTER, the man for whom he was named. We have only the mere outlines of his personal history during this memorable cruise, of which it is to be hoped that some member of the late Admiral's family may be able to give the world a complete account.—He was present at the capture of the Nocton, a British packet of 10 guns, on December 11, 1812; the Alert, March 14; and the Peruvian corsair Nereyda, on March 28, 1813. After the capture, on May 29, of the Atlantic, an English whaler of 8 guns, FARRAGUT served on board of her as an Acting-Lieutenant, under command of Lieutenant STEPHEN D. M'KNIGHT, and cruised in company with the Essex and the fleet of eight captured vessels turned into cruisers. Shortly after the fleet was reduced to three, the Atlantic was renamed the Essex Junior, and Lieutenant M'KNIGHT gave up the command to Lieutenant-Commander DOWNES. Acting-Lieutenant FARRAGUT appears to have returned to duty as a midshipman on the Essex. He continued in the Essex during the remainder of the remarkable cruise, in which nearly every English whale-ship known to be in the South Pacific was captured. He appears also to have taken part in the memorable war in the Marquesas, where the Essex and Essex Junior refitted in October and November, 1813, and for which privilege Commodore PORTER was compelled to assist the tribe who held possession of the bay in which he had cast anchor.

YOUNG FARRAGUT was on board the Essex during the memorable conflict in Valparaiso Bay, March 28, 1814, between the Essex and the British ships Phœbe and Cherub, and there, in the words of his commanding officer's report, "gave an earnest of his value to the service."

On the return of peace FARRAGUT spent a year in the study of military and naval science, and was then ordered to the Mediterranean, where he remained two years. During this time he was under the instruction of the chaplain of his ship, the Rev. CHARLES FOLSOM, from whom he obtained a moral as well as intellectual training that had a marked influence on his future life. The force of this training was subsequently illustrated by an incident which occurred on board the Hartford on the night before the attack on Fort Morgan in Mobile Bay. The men of the vessel asked for grog before going into action next day. "I have no particular objection to your having a little grog," he said, "if there is any on board; but I have been to sea a good many years, and have seen some fighting, but I have never seen the time when I needed rum to help me do my duty." Then, without waiting for an answer to his argument, he added, "I will order you two pots of hot coffee at two o'clock to-morrow morning, and at eight o'clock I'll pipe you to breakfast in Mobile Bay."

For the next forty years his career was the usual routine of sailor life in time of peace, with its alternations of sea and shore duty, furlough and foreign station. When the rebellion broke out he was at Norfolk, where he was settled, having married a Southern lady. Importuned by his friends to join the Southern cause, he remained true to his country and himself, and immediately made his way to New York, where he was officially stationed. Here he encountered Commodore M'Cauley, who, at his solicitation, told him the circumstances of the destruction of the Norfolk Navy-yard, and the noble vessels stationed there.

"How could you do it, Commodore—how could you do it?" he said, tears standing in his eyes at the thought of the sacrifice.

"My officers were false; there was no one I could depend upon."

"Why didn't you send for me?" thundered the old Captain, indignantly.

For several months after the outbreak of the war FARRAGUT was without a command, partly because the Navy Department had no fleet afloat at its disposal. At length, when the expedition against New Orleans was resolved upon, he was selected to command it. He entered the Mississippi River early in March, 1862. On the 17th of April FARRAGUT's mortar fleet began the bombardment of Forts Philip and Jackson, and on the 24th Commodore FARRAGUT with his entire fleet ran past those formidable batteries, encountering a fire almost unparalleled in severity, a fleet of gun-boats including several rams, fire-rafts, torpedoes, and other obstructions. An idea of the brilliancy of the exploit may be formed from the fact that some French and English officers who had been to New Orleans laughed outright at the notion of running the batteries, and warned the Commodore that "no fleet could pass up the river without a miraculous interposition." To which FARRAGUT replied. "You may be right; but I was sent here to make the attempt to take New Orleans, and I shall try it."

It is unnecessary to repeat the story of that daring feat, the immediate result of which was the occupation of New Orleans by the forces of the United States, a fact that destroyed one of the Vicksburg batteries, which resulted in nothing. The fleet under his command was finally retired to Pensacola, and its operations thereafter confined to blockading duty in the Gulf. In July, 1864, in conjunction with the land forces under General CANBY, he attacked and shattered Mobile. It was during this engagement—the last which FARRAGUT fought—that he had himself lashed to the rigging of the flagship, in order to watch and direct the fight. For his gallantry and success in this engagement he was promoted to the rank of Vice-Admiral. His rank is, of course, Full Admiral in 1866.

After the close of the war Admiral FARRAGUT was sent on a cruise in the Franklin to European waters, where every where received the most distinguished consideration and respect. But the broad constitution and mental strain of the war had broken his health, and he returned to this country a hopeless invalid. He suffered intensely for months previous to his decease, and death came to him as a happy release. He has passed away in the fullness of years and of fame, leaving a whole nation to lament his loss.

CHATEAUX EN ESPAGNE.

Where's the harm, tell me where,
Of building castles in the air—
An airy fairy nothingness
That brings a sweet forgetfulness?

The child sits still with pensive eye
And starts to hear the sudden cry,
"Again I see your vacant stare—Building your castles in the air!"

The weary boy has closed his book,
And sits with dreamy, wandering look:
Again the cry of "Whence this stare?
Still at your castles in the air?"

The man lies gazing at the sky;
Then sudden starts, with bitter sigh,
"My happiest moments still are there,
Within those castles in the air."

What man or woman, girl or boy,
But's tasted of the secret joy
That's in the fairy chambers lain
Of their own "châteaux en Espagne"?

So where's the harm, tell me where,
Of building "castles in the air"?
This airy fairy nothingness
That brings such sweet forgetfulness?

GENERAL FELIX DOUAY.

General Douay, whose heroic death at the battle of Weissenberg had a touch of old knightly valor and devotion, entered the army in 1832, at the age of sixteen. He obtained a Captain's commission in 1848, and was present at the siege of Rome, where he was wounded. He took a distinguished part in the campaigns in the Crimea, Italy, and Mexico. At the siege of Puebla he directed the operations of the left wing of the besieging army. The Moniteur gives the following touching account of his death at Weissenburg: "The General was from the beginning in the thickest of the fight. When he saw the day was lost, after he had done all that he could to retrieve it, when not even a battalion was left him, he called his aids one by one to receive orders, and sent them away. As soon as the last one was gone, the General, spurring his horse, rode some distance to the front, dismounted, and, taking a pistol from the holster, shot the animal. Then, turning around, he slowly walked toward the enemy. His soldiers vainly tried to stop him. Amidst the terrible firing he deliberately walked on. The retreating soldiers, aroused by the spectacle, turned again upon the enemy, but fell in heaps around their General, who still pressed forward. Another tremendous discharge from the enemy, and General Douay, almost alone, fell dead."

GENERAL TROCHU.

General Trochu, who is now in command of the defenses of Paris, and to whom has been intrusted the organization of a new army, is a soldier of great experience and ability. He is now about forty-four years of age, and has served with distinction in the Crimea, Italy, and Mexico. By some military writers he is considered the ablest tactician of modern times. At the commencement of the present war he was placed by General La Beite in command at Toulouse. The starting events succeeding the battle of Weissenburg have called him from this comparatively quiet sphere to the front rank of active operations.

DRESS IN CHINA.

Chinese dress is now so familiar, by the many exhibitions that have been held, that it may be passed over to speak of the peculiar mode of wearing the hair, which, both in the man and woman, is characterized by the well-known tail, the men, however, shaving the rest of the head. The tail was at one time the badge of the conquered, as the shaven board was of the slave among the Romans; the Tartars forced the Chinese to shave and wear the tail, till at last it became the universal custom. A Chinese does not, unless he is a mandarin, wear his mustache until he is forty, nor does he allow his beard to grow till he is sixty. A young lady wears her hair combed back and plaited into a tail, which is looped up and passed under the right arm to the breast, the fringe of hair being cut across the forehead. This is very becoming and pretty, but not before the married women appear. Their entire hair is twisted up into a knot at the top of the back part of the head, and silver bodkins or pins, often jeweled or enameled, are stuck in them, with bouquets of real or artificial flowers. They all paint prettily, forehead and cheeks white, with pearl-white, the cheeks crimson, and the lips vermilion; but they are not good artists, and make themselves frightful enough. The old painted hags more than young women. The custom of cramping the feet as the mark of gentility is well known, and ladies are often such cripples that they are carried every where by a servant; but it is only fair to add, to explain that the gentlemen have a similar fashion in letting their nails grow as long as possible, to show that they do not work for a living. The proud Chinese ladies and gentlemen, however, have never adopted these fashions to obliterate all kinds of active amusements and sporting.

PURIFY THE SKIN

By removing all mist from the blood. This can be effectually done by a timely use of a short course of Stafford's Iron and Sulphur Powders. Whether the initiating principle in the circulation be that which causes scrofula, salt-rheum, scald-head, white swelling, or any ordinary cutaneous eruption, the beneficial effect will be the same. The sulphur corrects the poison and unhealthy secretions of the body into a gaseous form, and by the action of the mineral it carries up the increased vigor imparted to the circulation to the toxic action of the iron. The morbid matter thus becomes the exterior inflammation is discharged through the skin, and the cuticle regains its natural color and smoothness.

AMERICAN ORGANS,

Having completed an important addition to their Factory, together with improvements made necessary by their largely-increased business, the Manufacturers take pleasure in informing their friends and the musical public that they are now prepared to answer orders for all the various styles of their instruments.

As their reputation has been the slow growth of twenty years, and not the result of puffery, they propose to adhere to the principles by which they have succeeded, viz.:

To use best materials only, without regard to price;
To insist on the highest style of work;
To combine all the elements of power, but not at the sacrifice of sweetness and delicacy;
To look for constant improvement, keeping absolute perfection in view.

A Thorough Comparison is Invited as to all the points of superiority claimed for these splendid instruments.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIV.—No. 714.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

A STREET SCENE IN METZ.—[See Page 562.]

SCENE AT METZ.

WE gave, last week, a sketch of one of the ancient gateways of the city of Metz, within whose vicinity a series of desperate and sanguinary battles was recently fought. This week we give an interesting sketch, on our first page, of a scene within the walls of the city, taken when the streets were alive with preparation for the conflict and all the bustle and stirring activity of military operation. At the time the sketch was made every street formed a part of a vast camp. Even the civilians wore a martial appearance, and every where were bands of soldiers lounging about and looking for drink. "Drinking goes on all day," writes a correspondent, "and no wonder, for the heat is great, and the thin potations of vin ordinaire do not fire the blood, though as much can not be said for the bad brandy, the liqueurs, and the strange compounds which seem to have been manufactured on purpose for the army. It is not only that the soldiers like to drink, but they also go into the water. The shallow ditches round the fortifications are made useful in these ways: the men wade about there, wallowing in pools of filthiness, and also contrive to catch fish which have been washing all this time for the camp kettle. Here, and in the shallow stream of the Moselle, where it runs on the level country, the army of France washes, and fishes, and swims about all every day."

There were two camps, one on each side of Metz — the Ban St. Martin, occupied by four regiments of the line and a battalion of chasseurs; and the Polygon, consisting of four or five regiments of the line, a battery of artillery, and another battalion of chasseurs. A few days suffced to make a complete change in the aspect of affairs, and to crowd the city with the disorganized remains of a beaten army.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1870.

THE DUTY OF REPUBLICANS.

THE tone of some of the chief Democratic papers in the northern part of the country, when speaking of political prospects in the Southern States, shows a consciousness of divided counsels upon the policy of the party. This view is confirmed by the speech of Attorney-General AKERMAN upon the situation; and, even if the division were not known to exist, it would be made highly probable by the character and experience of the party. The point of difference, as we stated last week, is the opposition to declaring hostility to equal citizenship, and demanding the abrogation of the amendments. The Southern Democracy, arising in the ashes of the party, denounces "negro suffrage," and the laws that secure it. The Northern Democracy, better comprehending the spirit of the country, cries negro domination! "Let Heaven's sake, bush! Think and mean what you will, but don't talk about it!" But both wings of the party agree upon the essential point — they both refuse to acquiesce in the great settlements of the war. Not one of the recognized leading organs of the Democratic party has declared that those settlements must be respected, and that the contests of the future must be based upon new issues.

Undoubtedly there are those in the party who would like to see this position taken. But the very fact that it is not taken shows the efficiency of the power of the adverse sentiment — a power that can not be disregarded. Indeed, the Democratic party never ignored the anti-national point — they both refuse to acquiesce in the great settlements of the war. Not one of the recognized leading organs of the Democratic party has declared that those settlements must be respected, and that the contests of the future must be based upon new issues.

Undoubtedly there are those in the party who would like to see this position taken. But the very fact that it is not taken shows the efficiency of the power of the adverse sentiment — a power that can not be disregarded. Indeed, the Democratic party never ignored the anti-national character and traditions of the Democratic party. Consequently the methods of the Democratic party were appeals to the basest prejudice, and to the lowest world fear. It seemed at what it called "moral ideas;" it denounced the negro; and it defended slavery, not as an evil guarded by constitutional compromise, but as a system sanctioned by Christianity, and productive of the welfare of the slaves. At the point of the most utter demoralization of the party, when the speech of any Democratic statesman upon American politics was a hideous satire upon every American principle and sentiment of human instinct, slavery was swept away, and the party of slavery every where hurled from power.

It begins now to hope for resuscitation. Some of its younger members and recent proselytes would fain throw off the burden of the past. But it is impossible. The party and all its traditions and habits have made it. It is disciplined and ignorant; it hates the negro; it regards the Union as the measure of its defeat; it repeats its old shibboleth of State sovereignty and reserved rights; and it longs to undo all that the war and reconstruction have done. Which, therefore, the younger members and the proselytes speak of the old issues as passed away, and of the blunders of those who do not accept the new, they express their hopes, and their fears also, since they have dread defeat if their view be not adopted. But even the proselytes do not relinquish the old issues, lest they should lose all influence with the party. As we said, their tone betrays them. They know that it is very easy to talk of rolling off burdens and accepting new issues, but they know also, and do all thought-ful men, that the leopard does not easily change his spots, nor a party bred upon baseness suddenly become intelligent and honest.

The fact remains, therefore, and the country must bear it constantly in mind, that, whatever a few Democrats may wish, the Democratic party is not prepared to accept the measures in the national settlements since the war. The party is mastered, as it has been for many years, by its worst elements. Its newspapers men and convictions are those that controlled it at its last two National Conventions, and that still control it. Except in Democratic local successes and of not relying upon the past, as we have recently done, we have borne all this constantly in mind. We have seen, as we feel, that the career of the Republican party is the noblest chapter in our political history. We urged, and we repeat, that none of its most pressing and sacred duties is to guard the fruits of its great victories. It is still to insist that justice shall be done to every citizen every where. It is to take care that the late rebels do not "manage the negroes" as they please, but that the new citizens shall have every right of the old. It is to sustain the amendments. It is to assert the national power for the end, to reveal, it is to maintain inflexibly all that it has done, and done so well.

But it must do this with a constant regard for the settlements. It must never forget that a party in a country of active progress and intelligence can not rely upon questions with which it has already settled them, but must wisely deal with the demand of every day. The duty of the Republican party at this moment is plain. Resisting all efforts to open again the settled issues, but they should lose all influence with the party. As we said, their tone betrays them. They know that it is very easy to talk of rolling off burdens and accepting new issues, but they know also, and do all thoughtful men, that the leopard does not easily change his spots, nor a party bred upon baseness suddenly become intelligent and honest.

It is conceded that to carry to a belligerent articles useful in war is an offense for which the neutral taken in the act may be punished by the injured state. But it is very difficult, and, in fact, impracticable for a neutral government to watch trade so narrowly as to prevent such carriage, and Lord GRANVILLE is correct in saying that it can not be done. Moreover, in the absence of express treaty stipulations, it is difficult to decide what is contraband. The history of modern times affords no case that there are the widest differences of opinion. The treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, made many articles contraband ores contraband, and whatever serves for the equipment of vessels, excepting "unwrought iron and its sorts." Money has been sometimes contraband by treaty, sometimes excepted. So with provisions and horses. But, as we have before stated, articles of use in war are constantly changing with the progress of invention, so that no precise rule can be established in the absence of specific treaty.

And even in that case the good feeling of belligerents toward a neutral will depend upon the evidence of his moral sympathy. We, for instance, are neutral in the present war, and it is to be hoped that we shall remain so. But, of course, our sympathy is not equally with the French, if they could read our papers, and know the real feeling of the country, would feel much less kindly toward us than the Germans. And it is to this sympathy that we must confide the mutual good understanding of Germany and England. Meanwhile the existence of such a universal sympathy with Germany in this contest is well understood. It is not with any dynastic ambitions, nor are any such motives sought to be gratified. An effort at territorial aggrandizement beyond the German frontier would bring upon Prussia a coalition of the nation. There is no misapprehension upon this point, nor does any thoughtful man in Europe or America even suppose that such an attempt would follow the war. We may fairly anticipate as the result of the contest the actual union of Germany, and the emancipation of France from personal government. Should it be prolonged, other and unforeseen changes, arising from the social discontent of Europe, must be expected.

A VIRTUOUS IF.

IT was lately announced from Spain that if the insurrection in Cuba was not suppressed by September, fifteen thousand more troops would be sent out. This statement was made on the occasion of a dispatch from Washington that the island was to be given up to fire and sword. And thereupon the enemies of the Administration loudly declared that General GRANT had surrendered the Monroe doctrine, had betrayed the honor of the country, and had made the United States responsible for the mad slaughter and devastation which were about to take place in Cuba. It is not easy to conceive a more ludicrous assault, and it shows how little serious objection can be urged against the Administration, when such an absurd criticism is gravely made. If an increased force is sent from Spain—if it proceeds to slay, burn, and torture—if the wretched island is washed in blood, and if the United States Government sees the laws of war violated and humanity outraged without a protest, then, indeed, it would betray the honor of the country and outrage the national feeling. There is much virtue in if. As for the Monroe doctrine, it would have as much to do with it as the tariff of the German Zollverein.

The position of the United States toward the Cuban difficulty, under this Administration, has been honorable, unmistakable, and consistent with the best traditions of the government. It has been honorable, for the Government has vigilantly executed its own laws, and has faithfully observed its treaty engagements. It has been unmistakable, because its action has been frank and open. It has been consistent with our best traditions, because, while protecting the natural sympathy of American citizens for all people striving for independence and self-government, it has unalterably maintained the doctrine that every government may properly take part in every quarrel, and has asserted that the question of belligerency is one of fact, and not of sympathy. It has remembered, and emulated the honorable position of President WASHINGTON, when war arose between the then recent enemy and friend of the United States; and it has borne steadily in mind, as its rule of action, what President MONROE said of his own Administration when it accorded belligerent rights to the Spanish colonies of South America, fifty years ago: "If the views of the movement assumed such a steady and consistent form as to make the success of the provinces probable, the rights to which they were entitled by the laws of nations, as equal parties to a civil war, were extended to them."

Meanwhile, as the contest in Cuba has been occasionally conducted upon both sides with unjustifiable ferocity, our Government has made the most earnest and emphatic remonstrances; and it is unquestionably this position of the United States which has restrained the savage, upon the whole, within the limits of civilized warfare. That the Spanish Minister in Washington misunderstands this position is an absurd conjecture. No man knows better than he the character and tendency of the situation. No man so authoritatively as he would insist that the rules of war must be respected in Cuba by his Government, because he understands that nothing would so immediately decide public opinion and the Government of the United States upon practical intervention in Cuba as a Spanish policy of fire and sword. If the story of the dispatch from Washington is true, and that Spain proposed to Europe a slaughtering and burning in September, the United States Government would immediately interfere, and upon principles as familiar and honorable and acknowledged as those upon which it has hitherto proceeded.

Nothing is more authoritatively recognised than the right of nations to interfere in a quarrel which is waged in a manner repugnant to humanity, and even to limit such interference by war. Great Britain, France, and Russia so interfered for the Greeks against Turkey in 1827, when the combined fleet of those powers destroyed the Turco-Egyptian fleet in the harbor of Navarino, and secured the independence of Greece. HALLECK declares that the plea of humanity alone, without regard to the interests of commerce or of European repose, was a sufficient justification. There were differences and differences between Holland and Belgium, and between Turkey and Egypt. They are among the most familiar facts of modern history; and it must have an amusing conception of the present Government of Spain to suppose it ignorant of them, and a most contemptuous estimate of its common-sense to imagine that it would provoke such inevitable interference in Cuba from the United States. If Spain is ignorant it is alleged that she proposes to do in Cuba, the prompt and peremptory remonstrance of the United States Government would be the more powerful from its honorable attitude in the contest hitherto.

BURNING OF DARIEN, GEORGIA.

ROBERT F. CLYDE, Rector, and W. ROBERT GIMBLLIAT, Senior Warden of St. Andrew's Church, Darien, Georgia, have published an appeal "to the generous and loyal Episcopal Church and all other friends of religion and education in the United States," asking relief for their parish.

This appeal begins by a statement concerning a young officer in the service of the United States who was stationed, with a detail of his regiment, in the assault upon Fort Wagner, and is in these words:

"June 11, 1863, without an engagement, the town of Darien, Georgia, was taken and burned by the United States colored troops, Colonel SHAW, Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Regiment, commanding."

This statement is incorrect in so far as it relates to Colonel SHAW, Colonel MONTGOMERY having been the officer in command.

Colonel SHAW's opinion respecting the burning of Darien may be learned from the following extracts from letters written by him at the time, which we publish as an act of justice toward all concerned in that affair:

"In Sight of Darien, June 11, 1863.

"His Excellency JOHN A. ANDREW, Governor of Massachusetts:

"DEAR SIR,—. . . On the 10th and 11th inst. we took part in what the Government will say is a victory. We met no enemy, and our only exploits were the capture of 68 bales of cotton, and the burning of the town of Darien. The latter was a most disgraceful occurrence. I never knew before of a town being burned in the presence of troops, and I suppose, especially when it contained only old men, women, and children."

"June 12, 1863. . . . About noon we came in sight of Darien. . . . MONTGOMERY said to me, 'I shall burn the town.' I told him that I did not want the responsibility, and he was only too happy to take it all on his own shoulders; so the regiment, after landing, turned to the ground. One of my companies assisted in burning the town, and I am ashamed to say it. The reason he gave me for destroying Darien was that it was inhabited by rebels; that he knew it to be a real war, and that they were to be swept away by the hand of God like the sons of Ham. In private he may seem all right to some; but when it comes to being made the instrument of the Lord's vengeance, I really don't like it. Then he says: 'We are untrained, and therefore must be bound by the rules of civilized warfare.' But that makes it none the less revolting to me to have a hand in the massacre upon these people. . . . I have not yet made up my mind as to what I ought to do. Besides my own private feelings, I am bound to say, frankly, that I am not sure that it will not be very injurious to the reputation of black troops and of those connected with them, if they are to be given through the war so far without disbonor, and so as not to degenerate into a plunderer and a robber; and the same applies to every officer in my regiment. If I were the only one concerned, I should run the South with fire and sword, I might look at it in another way, for then a certain amount of what had been decided upon as a necessary policy, as the case would stand, I should be willing to bear, who attacks and destroys defenseless women. . . .

"MONTGOMERY, from what I have seen of him, is a conscientious man, and really believes what he says: 'That he is doing his duty to the best of his knowledge and ability.'

"There are only two courses for me to pursue: To obey orders and my nothing, or to refuse to go on any such expeditions, and be put under arrest—probably courtmartialled—which is a serious thing."

"June 13, 1863. . . . I wrote to-day to General HUNTER'S Assistant Adjutant-General; for, unless MONTGOMERY receives from Head-quarters here the countermand in time, I am determined to refuse to obey his orders in that respect."

"June 28, 1863.—MONTGOMERY returned from Hilton Head this morning. . . . He found General GILLMORE, who has ordered General HUNTER, very friendly and anxious to second him in every way, with the exception of the burning business—as that is satisfactorily settled. MONTGOMERY now tells me that he acted entirely under orders, and was at first very much opposed to it himself, but finally changed his mind."

"June 18, 1863. . . . I think now, as I did at the time of the burning of Darien, that such wanton destruction is cruel, barbarous, impolitic, and degrading to our service and our cause. I shall always regret that I did not present myself just as I did. . . . It is rather hard that my men, my officers, and myself should have to bear part of the abuse for that affair, when they—the officers, at least—all felt exactly as I did about it."

"Lieut.-Col. HALPINE, A. A. G. 10th A. C. & Dep. of the South:

"DEAR SIR,—Will you allow me to ask you a private question, which, of course, you are at liberty to answer or not?

"Has Colonel MONTGOMERY orders from General HUNTER to burn and destroy all towns and dwellings houses he may capture? On the 11th inst., as you know, we took the town of Darien without opposition, the place being occupied, so far as we ascertained, by non-combatants. Colonel MONTGOMERY burned it to the ground, and, at leaving finally, shelled it from the river. If he has done this on his own responsibility, I shall refuse to have a share in it, and take the consequence; but, of course, if he is acting under headquarters, it is a different matter; as in such case I suppose it to be my bounden duty to support that policy. He ordered me, if separated from him, to burn all the plantation houses I could find.

"Now I am perfectly ready to burn any place which stands, and pretty much everything else in reasonable, but it seems to me barbarous to turn women and children adrift in that way; and I can only assign the Colonel MONTGOMERY in a private enterprise of his own, in the very distasteful to me.

"I am sure that he is not a military way of getting information, and I hope you will feel that I shall not be blamed if I refuse to answer my questions.

"Believe me, very truly yours,

"ROBERT G. SHAW,

"Colonel Commanding Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Regiment."

NOTES.

IN an old book of travels, which may be found in almost every library, there is a curious account of the ludicrous prejudices of one of the tribes in the interior of New Holland. Thus, if a bald-headed stranger suddenly appears among them, the savages of the tribe, after one look at him, close their doors and refuse to receive him, as if he were accursed. We who are civilized, and especially those of us who wear wigs, know, however, that a bald-headed man is as good in the rest of us. But in the interior of New Holland they have a great idea of hair. Upon reflection, however, it was not New Holland, it was New York, that the book must have described. For we find the following paragraph in the latest newspaper:

"The steamship Palmyra, from Liverpool, via Queenstown, brings 1,000 tons of freight, among other passengers, President HAYES of the Liberian Republic in Africa, and his private secretary. They sailed for admission at several well-known hotels, but were not successful, and are now at the Astor House."

THE FIRST PRINTERS.

IN one of the squares of the old imperial city of Frankfort-on-the-Main stands the handsome monument, represented on this page, erected to the memory of GUTENBERG, FAUST, and SCHÖFFER, who were associated in the earliest development of the art of printing. FAUST, or FUST, as his name was sometimes written, probably had no share in the invention of the art; and his connection with it began in 1450, when GUTENBERG, having expended a fortune in experimenting, induced the former to enter into partnership with him, and advance funds to establish the business of printing at Mayence. The only known productions of the press of FAUST and GUTENBERG are an indulgence granted by Pope NICHOLAS V. to PAULINUS CHAPTS, Embassador of the King of Cyprus (of which thirteen copies, printed on vellum in 1454, remain), and two copies of a second edition, printed the following year, and an appeal to Christendom against the Turks, supposed to have been printed in 1454. In 1455 FAUST had a disagreement with GUTENBERG, and put an end to the partnership by suing the latter for his advances. He gained his suit, and obtained possession of most of the stock in satisfaction of the debt. He then took into partnership his son-in-law, PETER SCHÖFFER, who had been in their employment, and who had perfected the process of making movable metallic type by the invention of the punch.

FAUST and SCHÖFFER for several years kept the printing process a secret, and produced many works, among which was the first printed edition of a classic author—the De Officiis and Paradoxa of CICERO—a copy of which is in the Astor Library. In 1462 Mayence was sacked by the troops of ADOLF OF NASSAU, and FAUST's establishment was broken up. His workmen were scattered, and his secret was divulged by them in other countries.

The pedestal of this monument, which also serves as a public fountain, is of fine sandstone. The figures are of bronze, and colossal in size. The central figure is that of GUTENBERG, holding in his hand a specimen of the newly invented movable type; on his right is SCHÖFFER, and on his left FAUST. The medallions, thirteen in number, on the frieze, are the heads of celebrated printers. Four sitting figures on separate pedestals represent Theology, Poetry, Natural Science, and Industry. Underneath these are four heads of beasts, which serve as water-spouts, and also to represent the four quarters of the globe—indicating the universality of the art.

BARON VON MOLTKE.

THIS able general, to whom the Prussians undoubtedly owe the magnificent and surprising successes that have attended their invasion of France, is very like General GRANT in character, of unassuming manners, and reticent to a degree that would drive an interviewer mad. It is said he seldom speaks to any body, and, though familiar with seven languages, can never be drawn into conversation. The following anecdote, which we find in a London paper, is very characteristic of him. Just before the war a well-known and extensive speculator in stocks met him on the street, and, desiring to get a hint for future use, as there was already much talk of an outbreak between France and Prussia, ventured to ask him, "Well, General, how are things getting on?" "Thank you, Sir," was the old gentleman's reply, "my rye crops are getting on beautifully, but my potatoes are very backward." The speculator took the hint, and forebore to press his inquiries. The General can hardly feel dissatisfied with the way things have been getting on with him since.

GENERAL MANTEUFFEL.

GENERAL MANTEUFFEL, whose portrait is given on this page, has acted a prominent part in the military and diplomatic history of Prussia during the past fifty years. He was engaged in the Schleswig-Holstein war, and in the war with Austria had command of the Prussian troops in South Germany, and made short work with the armies of Bavaria and the other smaller German states. After levying a forced loan of thirty millions of florins upon the inhabitants of Frankfort-on-the-Main, he marched his corps, on the 25th of July, 1866, toward the Tauber. On the following day he engaged and defeated the Baden troops near Werbach, and the combined troops of Austria, Wurtemberg, Nassau, and Hesse near Bischofsheim; and on the 25th the whole of the Eighth Corps of the Federal army at Gerchsheim, and the Bavarians at Helmstadt. On the 27th he was before Würzburg, and commenced the bombardment of the Marienberg. This was rapid work, and none the less effective and important because it was performed with a comparatively small force; for it prevented the South German states from sending active assistance to Austria, and prepared the way for the consolidation of several provinces with Prussia. As Governor of Frankfort he ruled the inhabitants of that city with a rod of iron, and earned their hearty ill-will by his harsh and arbitrary measures. On the close of the war he was intrusted with an important mission to the Russian court.

Thus far the name of General MANTEUFFEL has not appeared prominently in accounts of the advance into French territory. It appears from recent dispatches that he was in command of the Prussian reserves in the battles before Metz. He now commands the First Corps.

THE STORY OF A SHIPWRECK.

CHAPTER XII.

Preparations for the Voyage.—Getting in Ballast.—The Departure.—Losing their Provisions.—Sea-sickness.—In a Heavy Sea.—Land in Sight at Last.—Taken from the Boat.

THE boat, being entirely empty, floated very lightly upon the water. The first thing to be done, therefore, to prepare her for sea was to ballast her. The men were all ready for this operation, for they had previously brought from the wreck a number of the "pigs" of iron which had formed the ballast of the Grafton, and had arranged them on the shore ready to be put on board. So Mr. Raynal chambered up the side of the boat and descended through one of the scuttles into the hold, and there received the blocks of iron as the other men passed them up to him and placed them in a row in the bottom of the boat over the keel. This brought the boat down properly into the water and gave her the requisite steadiness. They afterward covered the ballast with a platform of boards, and secured the boards in place by transverse pieces nailed firmly to the ribs on each side.

When this operation was completed they found that the boat was immersed to the depth of about two feet in the water, so that all the old portion was submerged, leaving no part of the hull to be seen above water except the new portion which they had added. They moved her out to where the wreck was lying and fastened her safely there on the side of the wreck toward the shore, where she would be sheltered from winds or seas driving in from the bay, in case of bad weather intervening during the time that they were making their preparations for departure.

On the nineteenth of July every thing was ready. Their little tank was filled with water, and they had put on board a supply of soil for food. It was midwinter with them by the calendar, but the sun had passed the solstice, so that the days were growing longer; and, as their preparations were made, they concluded to take the risk of commencing their voyage. It had been agreed by common consent that George and Harry, who were the two youngest and most vigorous of the party, should remain behind after a solemn covenant on the part of those who were to go that, if they succeeded in reaching any port, they would immediately do their utmost to send them succor.

Before the embarkation they all assembled in the cabin for religious service. They there joined in prayer to God that he would take them under his protecting care, both those who were to embark on a voyage in which they must necessarily be exposed to great hardship and suffering, and which was so uncertain as to its termination, and also those who were to be left behind alone and weak for on that desolate island. Then after a fraternal embrace they repaired to the boat, which had been drawn up at a convenient place on the shore. There Mr. Raynal and Captain Musgrave took farewell of the two who were to be left, and then went on board. They immediately hoisted sail and began to move rapidly down the bay, leaving their companions on the rocks watching them despondingly as they glided away.

The morning was cold, but the sky was clear, and the wind was fair. At eleven o'clock they passed out between the two capes which formed the entrance of the great bay. There was still, however, a line of reefs through which some opening was to be found. They went on in the northward, keeping near the shore till they came, at about three o'clock, to such a passage, and then passed out into the open sea. The Arrow sailed, as they judged, at the rate of about six miles an hour. She rode the seas very well, but the joints admitted some water. They could, however, easily keep her clear by means of the pump, but not until their stock of soil meat was soaked with the salt-water and spoiled.

They went on very prosperously for a time, with the exception of the misfortune of losing their provisions, until at length the peaks of the Auckland Islands sank below the horizon. They continued their course to the northward, cheered somewhat by the thought that every mile of their progress brought them not only nearer to their hoped-for haven, but nearer also to the returning sun. Gradually the wind and sea began to rise. The motion at length became so violent that they were all attacked with sea-sickness, nevertheless they all bore past experience of the sea. Their situation now became extremely distressing. Night came on. The billows increased in magnitude and violence until at length the boat was repeatedly overwhelmed by them, and was employed now and then also by driving gusts of snow and hail. At length, about three o'clock in the morning, a sea struck them so violently as to throw the boat entirely over upon her beam ends. Indeed, so tremendous and so bewildering was the concussion that it seemed to them as if she was rolled over and about in the water like a cork floating at the mercy of the waves.

As soon, however, as the surge had passed, the ballast, which fortunately had been very firmly secured in its place, brought the boat again into her proper position; but the same accident happened to them two or three times during the night.

They passed three days and three nights in this way without any material change. It would be impossible to describe the sufferings that they endured. At length, on the fourth day, the storm died away, and the sea became calm again.

While the storm continued the wind had driven them forward rapidly on their way; and on the fourth day, to their great joy, so far as they had strength left in any emotion whatever, they came in sight of land. The land was Stewart Island, the southernmost portion of the New Zealand group. But the wind had now so entirely gone down that their sail was useless. They had been sure, when they were so completely exhausted that they could not use them, that the exhaustion consequent upon having been buffeted so mercilessly by the wind and sea, they had had no food for three days.

They remained all day, in sight of land, but unable to advance toward it. In the evening a breeze sprung up, but they did not dare to attempt to go in among the rocks and shoals that bordered the shore while it was dark. So they lay to outside till morning. In the morning they went in and found their way to the entrance of a small harbor. In turning round a point of land they saw a creek bordered by huts, with gardens adjoining them.

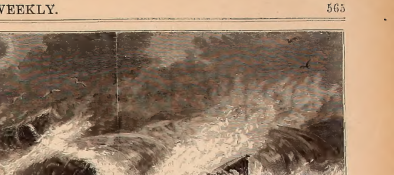
They uttered a feeble exclamation of joy at this sight. As they went nearer they saw a white man on the beach attended by a large Newfoundland dog. He stopped now and then, as he walked along, to play with the dog. At the door of one of the huts a number of native women were sitting, talking together with much gesticulation. At another place some women, with children around them, were spreading clothes upon a fence to dry. Mr. Raynal says it was impossible to conceive the effect which this spectacle of a community of human beings, living in peace and plenty in their homes, produced upon them.

The dog seemed to be the first to observe them, and, by barking, called general attention to the sight of a sail-boat coming into the harbor. The whole village was immediately thrown into a state of the wildest excitement. They flocked to the shore at the place where the boat grounded, as she touched the sand of the beach. The little strength that remained to the men on board, and which had sustained them thus far, instead of being revived and increased by the assurance that they were saved, seemed now to fail them entirely. It was impossible for them to speak in reply to the questions that were asked, and they were taken out of the boat by the white man and the natives, and carried up to a house, utterly helpless, like men actually dying.

The house to which they were taken was that of the white man whom they had seen walking on the beach. His name was Cross. He and his wife were indefatigable in their kind attentions to the sufferers. After warming them and refreshing them with a partial bath of tepid water, they caused food to be prepared for them, the sight of which, spread before them on the table, made them think that their appetites would never be satisfied with it. They found, however, that a very small quantity was all that they could eat, and after taking this they felt an irresistible disposition to sleep. So they all went to bed and slept profoundly until the following morning.

On awaking they found their strength much revived; and, true to their promise, the first thing which occupied their thoughts was the question of finding means to rescue George and Harry, who had been left behind. They conferred with Mr. Cross. He said that the largest vessel there was in that region was a yacht belonging to him, named the Flying Scud, but he remembered that they should proceed at once to a port and town called Invercargill, which was situated at some distance to the northward, on the southern part of the central island of the group, and which was called Stewart Island, when there then were, by a narrow strait. There, he said, they would find a government office where they could formally report the loss of their vessel, as required by maritime law in such cases, and make arrangements for sending a vessel to rescue the two men.

So they all embarked at once on board the Flying Scud and proceeded to Invercargill. Their arrival produced a great sensation among the inhabitants of the little town; and as soon as their story was known the people vied with each other in efforts to do them service. They found a home in the house of Mr. Colyer, one of the principal inhabitants of the place. Captain Musgrave made his report at the proper office of the wreck of his vessel. At the same time he informed the officers of the condition of the two men that had been left at the Auckland Islands, and asked that a vessel might be sent out by the government to rescue them.



IN A HEAVY SEA.

The officers replied that they had no vessel at their disposal which could be sent, but that they would see by-and-by what could be done. But Captain Musgrave thought that "by-and-by" would be too late.

As soon as these facts became known about the town a great degree of sympathy began to be felt for the two men, and the people determined that, since the government could not do any thing, they would make an attempt themselves. A meeting was called and a subscription was opened for raising the necessary sum to defray the expenses. There was, however, no suitable vessel to be obtained. The only one at command was the yacht Flying Scud, which was a sail-boat of only fifteen or sixteen tons burden, built to cruise in the inland waters of the New Zealand group, and to make short voyages, in good weather, along the shore. Mr. Cross, though accustomed to navigate his little vessel within these bounds, was not willing to take the responsibility of finding his way in her across six hundred miles of stormy seas to a group of rocky islets, the approach to which must always be attended with great danger.

Captain Musgrave then, notwithstanding his feeble and exhausted condition, and his intense desire to return to his wife and family by the first vessel going from New Zealand to Sydney, offered to go himself and serve as pilot for the yacht. The preparations for the voyage were immediately made, and in a week from that time she set out with the acclamations of a great crowd of people who assembled on the beach to witness her departure, and who expressed their good wishes for her by long and loud cheering. Mr. Raynal remained behind, for he was in too exhausted and debilitated a condition—owing to his constitution having been enfeebled by his previous sickness, and to his having been thus less able to endure the hardships and exposures of their life when on the island—to have accompanied them, even if he could—to have borne any of any essential service. He shook hands with Captain Musgrave before he went on board, with mingled emotions which it is much more easy to imagine than to describe.

GOING TO THE FRONT.

THE enthusiasm of the Germans is well illustrated by the following account of the muster and departure of the Leipsic Fusiliers, from Brunswick, narrated by an eye-witness: "At two o'clock this morning (July 22) we were awakened by drums at the gates. It was the 'spell' for the men to march. We got up and dressed, and went down to the market-place. Day was just beginning to dawn; a wild, stormy morning, with black clouds hanging all over the city. The whole place was in uproar, and women and children all streaming toward the market-place, where a band of music was playing martial airs. Presently went down with us in a perfect glow of enthusiasm, and burning to be off to the front. Almost poor fellows' eyes were now tears and sobs than there was enthusiasm, for a great many of them have wife and children behind. This was a scene I never shall forget. The men, between fifty and sixty, were assembled in the market-place; the gentleman locally made a subscription, so that each poor man might at least have a few shillings in his pocket; and many there were that we promised to care for their families in their absence, or in the case of their not returning. The clergyman of the place mounted on a cast and made a short fervent address, and ended by reading the 46th Psalm: 'God is our refuge and strength; a very present help in time of trouble.' Then the Lord's Prayer was offered up, and amidst tears and sobs the poor fellows went off. They were to have marched to Brunswick, but the neighboring farmers had all turned out with their carts to drive them there. Now our chief thought is to get them those that are left behind, and to prepare for the wounded. We have promised to subscribe so much a week, and we have been joined in

CHAPTER XI.

THE GUIDE TO GETHIN.

It is the spring-time, that time of all the year when there is "no year" dearer and most to leave it, if only for a day or two, and breathe the air of the mountains or the sea; the time when the freshest incense arises from the great altar of Nature, and all men would come to worship at it if they could. Even the old, who so far from the East have traveled that they have well-nigh forgotten their priesthood, feel the sacred longing; in their sluggish blood there still beats a pulse in spring-time, as the sap stirs in the ancient tree; and the young turn to the open fields with rapture, and drink the returning sunbeams by like wine. To draw breath beneath the broad sky is to them an intoxication, and the very air kisses their cheek like the red lips of love.

With his face set ever southward and westward, Richard Yorke has traveled afoot for days, nor yet his friend; neither coach nor train has carried him, and all the luggage that he possesses is in the knapsack on his back, to which is strapped his sketch-book, like a shield. He is striding across a heath-clad moor, with stony ridges, and here and there a distant mere—brimmer—dense like barren sea enough, but with sunshine, and a breeze from the unseen sea. It is classic ground, for here, or hereabouts, twice or centuries ago, was fought "that last weird battle in the west," whereon King Arthur perished, and many a gallant knight, Lancelot, or Galahad, Bedivere or Sir Tristrem, or that Cornish moor before him on which the dying Roland was carried by his faithful and low solitary it was; for even what men were near were underground, and not a roof to be seen any where, nor track of wheels across the rye-grass. There had been men enough, and beasts and forts too, in old times—human and ravening creatures, and huge forests: but it seemed, as the wayfarer looked around him, as though all things had been in a hurry to clear them from the beginning of creation. Richard, artist though he was by calling, had no wish now to take pleasure in a picture for the filling in of which so much imagination was required; and he turned away from one of the nearest tors and climbed it, in hopes to see some dwelling-place of man. He was gregarious by nature, and, besides, he was in want of his mid-day meal.

There was feast enough before him for his eyes.

In front lay a great table-land, isolated here and there with those chasse-lands in which wood showed how high the cliffs were which they cut. In one, nestled a fishing-town, with its harbor; in another, a white range of cottages perched on the green hill-side; and in the third, at sea, as it appeared, stood up an ancient castle, huge and rugged. But the last object was at so great a mass size that Richard rubbed his eyes like one in a dream. He had heard of ruined old castles, and certainly here was a habitation fit for the king of them. A lofty church upon the cliff-top beyond it, by affording him some measure of the probable size of this edifice, increased his incredulity. He looked again, and saw that it was not a castle, though the sun yet seemed to light up tower and battlement quite vividly, but only one isolated rock of vast size and picturesque proportions; upon the crown of which, however, there were certainly walls, and what looked to be broken towers. "That must be Gethin," said the young man, cheerily. "I must be at the end of my journey." Unless, indeed, he should take ship, there was not much more opportunity for travel. Before him stretched in all directions the limitless sea.

So magnificent had been the prospect that, when Richard descended and prepared to pursue his way again along the moor, he half doubted whether that fair vision had not been a mere figment of his brain; the more so, since what view there was about him seemed now to contract rather than to expand: the horizon was more limited; and presently nor sea, nor land, nor any view was to be seen. There was no rain, but his hair and mustache were wet with a mist that was thick as wool. Hy touch rather than by sight he presently became aware of a road left the heath, and was walking on downhill. Nothing was now meeting the verge of that line of cliffs which he had just seen, and which come to it before he was aware! As he paused, in some apprehension of this, all at once a wind sang broke upon his ear, like a solemn chant:

"Keep us, O Keep us, King of kings,
Under thine own almighty wings."

He did not recognize the words, but the tone in which they were sung, though muffled by the dense atmosphere, struck him as especially sweet and earnest. The next instant, walking rapidly, with a light and graceful motion, the dim figure of a young girl passed in front of him, and was almost closed behind her, though he still heard her joyous psalm. Richard stood like one enchanted. Was she an angel sent to warn him of his peril, or an evil spirit clothed in beauty and holiness to lure him on to it? He gave a glance at rock and the harmonious voice, already faint, grew still at once. He cried out again! "I am a stranger here, and have lost my way; pray, help me!

Then once more through the mist came the young girl, this time without her song, and stood before him; she was very beautiful, but with a pale face and frightened eyes. "She is crazed, poor soul," thought Richard, and he smiled upon her with genuine pity. She drew nearer to her side, as though in pain, or to repress some tumult of her heart.

"Where is it you wish to go, Sir?"

"To Gethin; where there is an inn, I believe. Is it not so?"

"Yes, Sir." Her words were sane and concise enough, but the tone in which they were spoken was tremulous and alarmed.

"You are not afraid of me, are you?" said Richard, in the voice that he had inherited from his mother.

"No, Sir, no," answered she, hurriedly; "only the fog was so thick, and I was startled. I did not expect to find any body here." It is a very lonely about Gethin, and we do not in general see any of the quality who come to sketch and such like"—and she pointed to his port-folio "until much later in the year."

"I am not the only stupid," rejoined Richard, smiling, "but only a wandering artist, who has heard of the beauties of Gethin. I should have told me, however, comes for short of the reality, believe me;" and he cast a glance of genuine admiration upon the fair speaker.

A slender fair-haired maiden she was, with soft blue eyes, over which the lids were modestly and attractively dropped. She was not a great experience of the sex—if not a very respectable one—has left on record a warning against eyelids. "A wicked woman," says he, "will take you with her eyelids."

"If you will, however, require wickedness to ensnare a young gentleman by these simple means.

"I wish, my pretty damsel," said Richard, softly, "that I painted figures instead of landscapes, for then I should ask you to sit for your portrait.

It was now modesty so much as sheer ignorance which kept the young girl silent; she had never heard of a painter's model; but the tone in which her new friend addressed her seemed a compliment, and she looked more confused than ever.

"Have you often so thick a fog as this at Gethin?"

"Not often, Sir; this is a very bad one, and you might have come to harm in it. Some folks believe that in such weather the Pixies come abroad, as they do at night, to lead benighted who have lost their way; and, indeed, the cliff-top is two hundred yards from the edge."

"Oh, you think I was misled by a bad fairy, do you?" returned Richard, in an amused and wondering tone. "Well, at all events, I have now met with a good one; and may I ask what name she goes by?"

"My name is Trevethick, Sir," said the damsel, simply. "I am no angel, but I am going to the place yonder; it is this way, Sir."

It was evident that his banter had not pleased her. The same tone that is found agreeable in the town does not always in the country, and the country. She motioned with her hand to the northward, and began to walk in that direction. Richard could not easily keep pace with her.

"But are there really fairies about here?" inquired he, nevertheless, in a more serious tone of voice. "I am quite willing to believe in strange things in these parts, and should be glad to learn all I can."

"Nay, Sir, I can not say; I have myself never seen one, though I know some who have, or say they have. There are those who say that the Pixies told about that moor you have come from. You can see the Giant's Castle on the cliff that tempts the tired traveler to mount him, and then carries him nobody knows whither; but, for certain, he rather sees angels."

"Then the spirits about here are all bad, are they?" I suppose to make up for the goodness and the beauty of the haunts, eh?"

"Nay, they are not all bad, Sir," continued the young girl, gravely: "the Buggans, who guard the buried treasures of the giants, have often helped a poor man out of their store; or, at least, to his skill."

"And the giants—are they all dead?"

"Yes, indeed, Sir, long ago," answered the damsel; "though they lived here once in true enough. There's Bonza's Chair, you must have passed before the fog came on, and could not but have noticed: and the hurling-stone he used to throw from Gethin cliff to Trevethick are to be seen still; but all that about his having such long arms that he could snatch the sailors from the deck of ships as they sailed by is but my judgment, but an old wife's tale, and I don't credit it. There, see, Sir," and she pointed to that is the castle yonder. When you see it thus it air it is a sign of storm.

That sign, instead of lifting, was growing less dense above, as it melted before the rays of the sun, and the ruin which Richard had taken for the hill-range was now once more visible, without the pedestal of rock on which it was placed. It was a gigantic shape, though not of great natural, and the young painter halted in mute admiration. The scene seemed scarcely of the earth at all.

"Most folks are pleased with that when they first see it," remarked his companion, with the flattered air of one who exhibits some wonder of his own to a well-pleased stranger. "You are very lucky to see it to such advantage, Sir, even in this view."

"I am lucky, too, in having so fair a guide to show it me," said Richard, gallantly. "There is a church in air too: what is that?"

"That is Gethin church, Sir. It stands all by itself, a mile from the village; but folks say that the tower was built there as a landmark for the ships, and that the church and church-yard were added afterward."

"Then people die here, do they, even in this land of dreams?" said Richard, half to himself.

"Die, Sir! I do so," answered the young girl, sadly; "my own mother died two years ago, and lies buried there in yonder lonesome place. But it is not much for fisher folks to die so young, except by shipwreck."

"Are there many wrecks here, then?"

"Yes, Sir, and will be to all time; our church-yard is half full of drowned men. On the nights before storm, up yonder, you may hear them calling out each other's names."

"Have you ever heard them?"

"Not I, Sir, thanks be to Heaven. I would not venture here at night for the best cargo that ever came to Torlock."

"Why, what is Torlock?"

"The port there behind us, Sir; you can see the houses now, but not the harbor. It winds beneath the cliff so that a ship can scarce be make it, save in smooth weather, though, when it once does so, it is safe enough. To see the great green waves rash in and turn, and turn, and waste themselves in their wild fury, as though they were ravished at the sight of it, is an awful sight."

"That is in winter-time only, I suppose?"

"Nay, Sir; we have storms at other seasons. Whenever I see such a sign as the castle without the crag—it's all clear now, you see, because the wind is rising—then am I thankful that my father is no sailor. Most folk are such at Gethin and are not much better."

"Then your father is a miner, is he?"

"No, Sir, not now, though he once was. Everybody knows John Trevethick about here, and why he don't work underground."

"How am I to learn?" inquired Richard, with interest. "You must remember I am a stranger, and know nothing."

"Well, Sir, it was years ago, and before I was born. Father was just married, though he was not a young man to be about a bridegroom, and was second to light the match, and follow him with all speed. Now, while there were still both at the bottom, it struck Cot that the match was too long, and he took a couple of stones, a flat and a lengthener, to cut it short. He did cut it short, sure enough, but at the same time kindled the match. Both shouted their loudest, and sprang at the ladder-way. Well, at that the windlass could not lift the double weight. You see, Sir, it was certain death for all three, unless one should give way. Then Coe jumped out, crying to father: 'Go aloft, John.' In one minute I shall be beneath, and he who had caused the disaster, and therefore, as he doubtless thought, would be the one to suffer most. He, besides, he reflected, perhaps, that he was an old man, and had no bride at home to mourn for him; still, it was a noble deed of all, I never denied it."

"Denied it!" exclaimed Richard; "I should think not. Why should you?" and he looked up with wonder into his companion's face. It was one blush from brow to chin.

"Well, Sir, I suppose," she, disregarding his interruption, "my father was hurried up; and as he looked over the basket the charge exploded, and the great fire by and blackened his face. In a minute more he was safe above-ground."

"But the poor man below?"

"He was dead, Sir. It could not have been otherwise. I don't like to say it so leant that he never did a day's work underground again. And when I was born a few months afterward, I was christened Harry—though that's a lad's name—in memory of the friend that saved his life by the sacrifice of his own."

"He might well have done that, and even more," said Richard, "if more could have been done."

"That's just what father says, Sir," answered the young girl, gravely. "But when things have happened so long ago—before one was born—they don't come home to one quite so strong, you know. Father keeps only his old gratitude, and his old tastes. He cares more for mines and machinery and such like than for any thing else; he is a better mechanic than any in Turlock, where I have just been to the watch-maker's to get him some repairs done. You should see the clocks he makes, and the rings he turns. He will be so pleased if you ask him to show them to you."

"I shall certainly ask him to do so, if I get there, which, indeed, I regard, replied the artist. "Is your house with the pretty garden?"

"No, Sir; that is the parson's. Nobody can get flowers to grow as he does. The next house at the top of the hill is ours."

"Why, I shall certainly know would be the inn!" exclaimed Richard, looking at the little white-washed house with the green door, or what seemed to be such, swinging in the rising breeze.

"It is the inn," said his companion, quietly, but not without a roguish smile. "Father keeps the Gethin Castle, although he has many other trades."

"And is that he, at the door yonder?" inquired Richard, pointing to a tall, thick-set man of middle age, who was standing beneath the little portico, with a pipe in his mouth.

"No, Sir, that is not father," replied the girl, with sudden gravity; "that is Solomon Coe."

CHAPTER XII.

A PERILOUS CLIMB.

"Is father in?" inquired the young girl of Solomon, as he stood in the doorway, without moving aside to let Richard pass into the house.

"No, he is not," returned the person addressed, in his turn, before eyed inspecting him the stranger. "As you were so long on your errand, he gave up his lock-work, and has gone off to the pit. He said he never known you loiter so."

"I did not loiter at all," returned the maiden, indignantly; "if it had not been for the fog, I should have been home an hour ago; but one can't walk through wool as if it were air. You had the fog here yourselves, hadn't ye?"

It was strange to note the change in the girl's speech; not only were her air and tone quite different from what they had been—her modesty or shyness exchanged for a confidence and even a touch of defiance—but her pronunciation had become blunt and provincial.

"Well, my say," said Solomon, sulkily, "turned Solomon," until I told him of the new copper lode, as I whispered to you of this morning (you were in the first to learn it, by), when off he set, in good-humor enough with all the world, to look at the workings in Cock Hawk. If you want him, young man, over at Dunlopyel, though I doubt whether you will find him much of a customer, considering as are in the first and steel line."

"I am in the knife-and-fork line just at present," answered Richard, good-humoredly; "and, if you will be good enough to move aside, I should like to make my absence."

"I ax pardon," said Solomon, sullkily, withdrawing himself from the doorway. "I did not know I was hindering customers. Who is this young spark, Harry?" added he, in a low tone, to the other entered the house.

"Well, he's a young gentleman, Solomon, as you could see very well if you chose," answered the girl, angrily. "He don't look much like a bagman, I think, any ways. I am sure father would not like you to treat his customers in that fashion."

"I am sure he wouldn't like your escorting such customers home, Turlock Dew-drops."

"That's father's business, and not yours, at present," answered returned the girl, tartly; "and perhaps it never may be yours. You take as much upon yourself because of your new copper mine as if it were gold."

"Nay, don't say that, Harry," replied the other, with an animating look, from which every trace of ill feeling seemed to have departed. "If it were gold, I should be more pleased, upon your account than on my own, you may depend upon it. You think I am jealous, now, of yonder bit of a lad, but—"

"I think nothing of the kind," answered Harry, impetuously.

"Why, then," returned Solomon, soothingly; "then well say no more about it. Trevethick wanted me to be away with him to pit, but I said: 'No, I'll not for Harry.' I'll bring her with me to Dunlopel. It's a great find, my lad, and may be the making of us all."

"Nay, a walk to Turlock and back is enough for one day's work, Solomon; and, besides, I'm not through with the fog, and some things my things.—Hannah! Hannah!" and, raising her voice to landlady pitch, she summoned some one within doors. "I didn't you hear the parlor bell singing? So—never mind me, Solomon; I dare say I shall have company enough. Paint the town and father come back;" and with that, and a careless nod of her shapely head, the young girl vanished into the inner apartment and shut up shutters.

The Gethin Castle Inn was a much better house of entertainment than might have been looked for in a spot so secluded from the world, and from Turlock even in summer time. A coast-trod passed through the little village leading from Turlock to the new mineral workings at Polwheel, and that was the sole means of getting to Gethin save on foot or horseback. There was no railway—to be called such—in the district. Dunloppel, always a productive mine, was, like its more famous brother, Botallack, situated on the sea-coast, so that neither road nor tramway had been created for its needs; the land around on the country, except in minerals, had not a tree was to be seen for miles. Indeed, with the exception of the parson's garden, there was scarcely a cultivated spot in the whole region. The graceful sprays of the sea-tamarisk, however, flourished in every where—to be called such—in the district. The graceful sprays of the sea-tamarisk, however, flourished in every where—to be called such—in places where certainly foliage is seldom seen. Not only did it grow luxuriantly on banks and granite copings of gardens, but, bowed by roaring sea-winds, which cut off all other vegetation, bent and contorted as it, but would its ringlets permanent upon walls and house-tops. Stony places have a special attraction for this weed; and here was a cottage actually that the roof at impertation into Gethin might have had more foundation to that same weed. Local legends equally credited. Only a few years back the plant had been unknown there, but a sugoner of the place, with more than common purpose, planted a sprig of it in some locality where it grew, to serve the purpose of a vicky—for what seemed to be such, swinging in the rising breeze.

"It is the inn," said his companion, quietly, but not without a roguish smile. "Father keeps the Gethin Castle, although he has many other trades."

tastes of those for whose use it was built—the windows of all its sitting-rooms opened upon the straggling street, while the glorious prospect of cliff and ocean which it commanded behind was totally ignored. Thus Richard Yorke found himself located in an apartment which, though otherwise tolerably comfortable, might as well have been in Bloomsbury for the view which it afforded. The walls were ornamented by colored pictures of the Royal Exchange and of the Thames Tunnel, London; and many of the mantelpieces was an equestrian figure (in china) of Field-marshal the Duke of Wellington as he appeared upon the field of Constitution Hill. The only attempt at "local coloring" was found in the book-case—composed of two boards and a cat's cradle—in which three odd volumes of the "Tales of the Castle" had been placed, no doubt with reference to the grand old rock on which the house walls beckoned "the quaint" to Gethin.

"I suppose, Sir," said he, looking in at the window of the room he had just left, and where Hannah, who was washing-stand as well as cook, errand-girl "in the season," was clearing away the remnants of the repast, "one can get to the castle without a guide?"

"Nay, Sir; you must get the key first, for the man don't look at the cottage, except at certain times, and the gate has got spikes at the top. Miss Harry has got it somewheres, if you'll wait a minute."

Miss Harry herself brought it out to him. She had changed her attire for one which became more becoming one than that she had worn before, and her bright brown hair was arranged with greater care, and perhaps with greater skill, to effect.

"The guide has not begun his duties yet, Sir," she explained, with a smile; "and so we keep the key here. You can't fail to find the road; but the principle-gate is a bit out of repair, as you like this, and you must be careful to take the right one; the old ledge was broken in by the storm last month, and has no safe grip."

"But why not show me the way yourself, Miss Harry?" asked the young man. "You know how easily I lose myself; and if I should come to harm, by taking the wrong turning, you would be sorry, I'm sure."

"Indeed I should, Sir," returned the young girl, simply; "and I doubt whether you will find any body else in the village. This news from the mine has taken them all off, it seems; and you wouldn't know rock from copper, unless you had one to tell you, they are so alike."

The fact was that Harry's countenance smote her for her wish to be of service to this handsome young fellow, since she had just refused to accompany Solomon to Dunlopeu, on the score of fatigue. It was level walking, or nearly so, to the pit-mouth, and it was a climb of many hundreds of feet to the ruin. Still, she felt no longer tired, if she had been so a while ago, and the stranger might come to harm without her aid.

"But you're not coming without a bonnet?" exclaimed Richard.

"Nay, Sir; I should come home without one if I went up yonder in such a wind as this," answered she, laughing; "and I'm accustomed you to fasten on your hat, if you wish to see it again."

"But you'll catch cold," urged Richard.

"We don't mind air at Gethin, Sir; and this shawl will cover my head, if that's all."

It really was Harry Trevethick's custom to go bareheaded in fine weather about her own home, though, perhaps, the consciousness that he never looked so well in even her Sunday head-gear, or with her own ample tresses for a covering, may have influenced her resolve. Chignons were unknown at that time, and never had the young man beheld such wealth of gold-tinged locks as that which blew about his fair companion's brow, and presently streamed out behind her, as they neared the cliff, and met the full force of that Atlantic breeze. It blew freshly and shrilly enough up the winding gorge through which they had to descend to the foot of the castle rock; but by the time they reached it, all but the wind had risen to a gale. They stopped a minute within shelter of a hollowed cliff to view the place. It was a noble prospect. The great waves came roaring in, and dashed themselves against the walls of slate in sheets of foam, that fell back baffled and groaning. Every hard enter the cliff away in two dark frowning spots, which his guide said were caverns, approachable at low water; but the rock itself on which the castle stood defied them; they had only succeeded in undoing it, except for a narrow footway at high water which now formed the sole access to it from the shore. Even without any historical or poetic association, the object before them—rising bare and sheer into the air to such a height—on which a swarm of gulls, shrunk to the size of flies, were clanging faintly, was grand and striking; but the place had been the hold of knights and kings a thousand years ago and more. The young girl pointed out to Richard where the main-land cliff had once projected so as to meet the rock, and showed him on the former's brow some fragments of rude masonry. "That was the ancient barbacan," she said, "once joined to the castle by a draw-bridge, as was supposed, which, when drawn up, left Gethin so that neither man nor beast could approach it without permission of its defenders. Even now, with none to hinder or, it is a steep and perilous way, especially in a wind like this. Perhaps it would be better not to venture."

"But you shall take my arm, Harry," said Richard; "only let me pin your shawl about your head first, lest those long locks of yours bind us both."

"I can do that myself, Sir, thank you," said Harry, austerely; then added, with a smile, to reassure him—for why should she be angry?—"so you would only have picked your fingers, Solomon says, to the bone above with his hands, excepting father."

"And you say that to a painter, do you, Miss Harry—a man who lives by his handiwork?"

"I forgot that," said Harry, penitently; "besides, I was only saying what Solomon says."

"That was the gentleman who took me for a pedlar, eh?" said Richard. "He is not quite so wise as his namesake—is he?"

"Oh yes, Sir; Solomon Coe has a long head: he's considerable wise, as I've told you, parts. He has made his own way famously in the world of mine, rather, under it, for he is a miner. He used to work in the coal-pits up Durham way, but—"

"Is that why he looks so black?" interposed Richard, laughing.

"Nay, Sir, I didn't notice that," said Harry, simply. "Very likely he was down Dunlopeu this morning. It half belongs to him, father says; and if this lode turns out as he hopes, he's very rich."

"And you—father would be glad of that, would he not?"

"Yes, indeed, Sir; for Solomon is the son of his old friend and preserver, as I told you before."

"But it would not please you quite so much—eh, Miss Harry?"

"Not so much as father—certainly not," answered the girl, gravely. "It seems to me folks are rich enough when they can afford half their own, just as other folk—like Mr. Carew, who owns all about here—are poor enough, with all their wealth, who pay out of their purse twice what comes into it."

"Mr. Carew is known here for a spendthrift, is he, then?"

"Well, Sir, it's only gossip, for he has never set sou here in his life, I reckon; but, as I said we hear, he must fling away his money finely. However, as father says, there's one comfort for him—he has nothing to leave child of his own. Eh, but you're looking white, Sir; Gethin air is apt to nip pretty sharp those who are not accustomed to it. You had best not try the castle to-day."

"Yes, yes: we will go at once," cried Richard, impulsively; and, drawing the girl's hesitating arm through his, he began the ascent, following the wind-swept way. Under the circumstances, there really was some danger; but, had there been none at all, Harry would not have shrunk from it at that moment—the chance observation of the young gallant's handsome face, so like offspring had turned his blood to a white heat of youth. Although his mother had studiously instilled in his mind the fact of his privilege in any expectations with respect to the Squire, he had always entertained some secret dread of his father with the bitterest resentment; he did not altogether forgive his mother for the shock which she had given him (in the registration of her own position in the register) in depriving him of his birth-right, and had left blasted at odds with all the world. He had come to Gethin partly on account of what Parson Whyne-ates had told him of its picturesque beauty, but chiefly because it was not out-of-the-way spot, unfrequented by that society with which he had such good grounds for quarrel, and where he was not likely to have his pride wounded afresh by any reference to his position; and he had not been two hours in the place before the only person in it in whom he was likely to be interested had fallen into his hands. He could not long be angry with her, however, for her involuntary offense, nor angry at all in his fair company. She clung to him, perforce, upon the narrow causeway, and shrunk with him into every little shelter that afforded, here and there, upon their toilsome path, when the two breath, and gathered strength together for the ascent confronting that pitiless blast. If either of them had known how fierce a gale was imminent, they would not certainly have ventured upon such an expedition; but, having done so, they were resolved to go through with it. Harry had plenty of courage, and fought her way with practiced eye and hand along the winding ledge; and Richard, who was not to be outdone, responded manfully to directions before which a woman did not quail. Twice or thrice, however, they were both driven back again round some comparatively sheltered corner by the mere fury of the wind, which had certainly been stubborn enough in even the disembodied spirits of the ancient defenders of the place; and when, unchastely, and almost reject its welcome aid. Then, just as his disengaged hand was clinging to a pinnacle of rock he had blew off, exactly as she had predicted, and his dark curls mixed with hers in wild confusion. Then, foot by foot, they won their way, and reached at last the iron-spiked door, the only work of modern hands on that gray rock. This screened them from the gale; and, as they stood a while to rest beneath its shelter, she showed him what a handsome key her father had made for it; with cunning wards, more suitable for a lawlet's safe than for such a portal as this, as she very guarded, and told him how the gate was put there to exclude the summer visitors, who would otherwise enter only too readily.

"Nay, but I will pay my fee," said Richard, gallantly; and, since their cheeks were almost touching as it was, the debt was easily discharged on her lips.

"For shame, Sir!" cried the girl, indignantly; and there was something in her face and voice which showed him that her anger was not feigned.

"I am sorry I brought you here, mistaking you for a gentleman. Here is the key, Sir; but I go back alone." And she freed herself roughly from his arm, and turned to go.

"For Heaven's sake, don't!" cried Richard, earnestly. "You may call me any thing you please, but do not, for my sakeless sake, be unjust. I was rude, but, on my honor, I did not intend to be so. Forgive me, Harry—indeed I see I have vexed you. Forgive me, pray; I did not mean to be either ungenerous or ungracious. If I have been so very wrong at Gethin—even with such great temptation—"

"Yes, yes, Sir," she broke in, vehemently and I was wrong to come with you."

"Nay, don't say that," pleaded the young fellow; "for I could not be wrong to do so great a kindness to a stranger as you have done to me here. It was my error—my thoughtless error, believe me, of the trouble and toil you have undergone for my sake; and I don't deny, Harry, that the key, of which I have never seen the like. But there, I am offending you again. Pray, come into the shelter; it makes me sick to see you in such danger;" and to make room for her, and at the same time to stand as much more in the blast as possible, he stepped back, forgetting the scanty space on which he stood, and fell!

A yard—a mile—he scarcely could say which, so overwhelming for the instant was his sense of shock. He did not know that he was flying through space. Then, suddenly, his feet found foothold, and his hands clung to the gray rock, and the first thing that struck on his body ceaselessly, and seemed to nail him where he clung.

Was it the scream of gull, or piercing cry of some spirit of the air, that rang through his brain? or was it, indeed, the agonizing shriek of a woman? He heard it plainly; but Harry never knew whether she had shrieked or not. She was aware of nothing except that this unforeseen peril was perishing—had, perhaps, already perished—for her sake; through fear for her safety, and his wish not to give her offense. She was on her knees upon the ledge, and craning over it with horror-struck face the next instant, and could see no sign plainly. His feet had fallen upon that very part of the old path which the storm of last year had torn and jagged away. A few jolting fragments of rock were all that was left of it—insufficient even for a practiced clamberer to find a way along on either side. His head—she could not see his face—was his hand beneath her; but how could she get at him?

"I am here," she cried. "Be not of good courage, Sir.

She had nothing to offer in the way of help at present—nothing but the well-spring of what vital importance it was that he should not lose heart. She lay down with her face on the bare rock, and strove to reach him; but, even had her arm been long enough, he had no hand to spare to clasp her own. The whole force of the gale was full upon her, and curried her hair to windward like a whip.

"Do not attempt to scale the ledge, brave girl," cried Richard, beginning to be conscious of her efforts. "Is there no rope nor ladder?"

"No, no," she cried back to the gulf. "Keep heart. Do not look down. I must be five minutes gone—no more."

She was up, and with the gate-key in her hand, ere she had done speaking. Great Heaven! would that door never open! How her trembling hands missed the key-hole; and when the key was in, how the rust's waste opposed its turning. Then at last the door was opened, it seemed as though the wind had husbanded their strength behind it for such a sortie, with such fury did they rush out. But she struggled in somehow, and on one knee, with bowing waste of cliff-top to the blast of storm, which formed the covering of a well. There, at the bottom, she found a rope coiled up, which was used to draw up water in an iron cup, to gratify the curiosity of visitors who desired to quench their thirst; and of this, indeed, to meet with fresh water there, the presence of which, no doubt, had caused the place to be chosen for a fastness in old time. With this she hurried back, and kneeling one end firmly round the door-post, she looped the other in a slip-knot, and lowered it carefully to Richard. "Put this beneath your arms," she said. "The rope is strong and firmly fastened. You must climb up by it, hand over hand."

"I will not," he said; "it is too easy a task for the young artist as for a Gethin man."

but he was strong and active; and where his chief difficulty lay, which was at the cliff-top, the girl's willing arms assisted him.

"You have saved my life, Harry," were his first words, when he stood in safety. "How shall I ever repay you?"

Then this brave girl, who had never faltered where action was necessary, began to sob and cry.

He took her hand and covered it with kisses. "I envy him this," said he, plaintively, "may I not?"

She did not withdraw her fingers, but neither did she cease from weeping. Her grief seemed to be something more than that resulting from the tension of strong fearfulness just released.

"Let me go home, let me go home!" was her sole reply to all his entreaties that she should be a while, and strive to calm herself. It was with difficulty that he could support her down the steep, so violently did she tremble. When they reached the foot of it she turned to Richard and murmured: "I have one favor to ask of you, Sir. I will not grant it to me."

"Most certainly, dear girl. It would be gross ingratitude indeed if I did not."

"Then never speak," returned she, earnestly, "of what has occurred to-day. Never show by your manner that you feel—as you say—grateful for what service I have been able to be to you. I am not father nor Solomon, you know."

"I will be very hard, Harry, to keep silence—to owe you so great a debt, without acknowledging it," said Richard, tenderly; "but, since such is your wish, I will obey it."

"Thank you, Sir," said now I will go home alone. I was deterred by the wind, the steepness—any thing you please—from accompanying you up yonder; remember that. You will not mind wasting a while behind me?"

"Surely not," said Richard, wonderingly.

And the next moment she had hurried round an angle of the main-land cliff, and was gone.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

NEW SCENE.—One day when the great Erskine was, as usual, on his way to Westminster Hall, with his large black bag crammed full of briefs, he was accosted by a sailor, who asked him if he was a dealer in old clothes? "No, my honest fellow," returned the counselor, "there are all new suits."

A police officer, seeing an African whom he knew, exclaimed, "Ah, Sambo, you are an incorrigible rascal! how, I'll give you a drink." "With all my heart, Sar," replied Sambo, "for I'm very dry; but, Sar, my niggers are haughty and proud, and won't stoop to drink with a police officer; but that's wrong. I think I can get liker almost, if not every way, as good as a nigger" (pointing to a nigger sitting by).

TOILERS OF THE SEA.

[See Illustration on Page 581.]

We ride on the back of the wave,
We dip in the trough of the sea;
Our boat is stout and our hearts are brave,
As fishermen's hearts should be.
For winds may be fierce and strong,
And the waves may do us wrong,
And those may weep ere long
Who wait for us there.

We laugh when the winds are fair,
And the stars play heavily
With the weight of fish, and there is no care
For the morrow and me.
But the winds may rage and roar,
And the surf beat on the shore,
And those wait evermore
Who wait for us there.

'Tis toil and danger and strife
Yet we love the greedy sea;
That gives us bread for a wagered life,
Bread for my lads and me.
But the waves in anger churn,
And the winds seem cruel and stern,
To those who wait and yearn
To welcome us there.

We laugh when the wind is light;
But my heart is heavy in me
Sometimes when I think of my lads at night,
And the perils of the sea.
For winds may be fierce and strong,
And the waves may do us wrong,
And those may weep ere long
Who wait for us there.

HEBRON.

I.—THE SOLITARY HORSEMAN.

It was about five o'clock of a fine afternoon in June, when a single traveler, mounted upon a very sleepy-looking steed, might have been seen riding slowly along the smooth highway that leads to the little village of Hebron, a quiet farming town in the northern part of Vermont. As I have no desire to make a Jamesian mystery of my hero, I will at once state that his name was Laurence Hardy; that he was a young gentleman of excellent family, fortune, and character, living in the city of the Knickerbockers; and that he was traveling with no special object except to enjoy the pleasant country and the glorious weather.

He was riding slowly on, between the hayfields, sweet with clover, when he was roused from a rather sentimental reverie by a great trumpling and clattering behind him; and, looking back, saw a gaunt, lumbering stage-coach, drawn by four lean horses, that looked as if they were trying to drive away from their harness. Hardy drew his own beast to the side of the road to avoid the dust; and as the huge thing creaked and swayed, and rattled by him, he saw, reflected lessly over the occupants of the vehicle. There were two or three common-looking faces, which turned toward him with a languid air of curiosity, and, on the middle seat, a stout, gray-bearded gentleman, a white straw hat. But the figure beyond him was hidden by his ample person; but the horseman caught the flutter of a green gauze veil, and saw a small gloved hand waving gayly side-strap of the reeling coach.

The village had just over the brow of the hill before him; and, quickening his pace, Hardy reached the door of its one tavern just as the stage was driven away. It was a delightful-looking place, its whole aspect promising "entertainment for man and beast." The old-fashioned, low-sided house seemed to stand right down in the green grass that almost overran the doorstone. Roses and lilacs by all arrangement of it was a farm-house as well as a tavern—and a number of comfortable-looking barns were grouped in the rear. A great elm-tree stood on one side of the green in front; and from one of its far-spreading branches swung a square sign-board, which, bore, in faded yellow letters, the inscription, "Darcey's Tavern."

Hardy was conducted to a large, airy chamber, where every thing was cool and fresh and sweet as hand could make it. Lighting a cigar, he sat down to enjoy the stillness and beauty of the afternoon. "In the spring a young man's fancies lightly turn to thoughts of love;" and Hardy's susceptible imagination was busy with dreams of a rustic graceful, dark-eyed enchantress with whom he had danced, and sung duets, and taken many walks through the fields the last month. Presently his attention was attracted by the sound of a pleasant laugh coming through the open window of the next room, and from his heard a musical voice say:

"Isn't that charming, papa? Such a supper in such a place! Why, it is the identical repast which, in old-fashioned novels, is always set out by the rural innkeeper—'a pat of butter and a cup from the cow, honey and bread, spread upon snowy cloth.'"

"Very satisfactory for the Arcadian style," a man's voice replied. "I'll trouble you for another biscuit, my dear. Stage-coach riding has given me an appetite."

"This hill country air would give any thing an appetite. I am glad that we re-mirror in Sunday, as we shall be obliged to stay over."

"I can stay over, my dear; but I am obliged to push on some miles further to a place where I have appointed to meet a man on business. The landlord will furnish me with a horse and wagon, and I shall return for you on Monday. You are not afraid to be left alone?"

"Afraid, in this house! Why, it is as innocent as Rasselas's 'Happy Valley.' The landlord is honesty itself, and his wife benevolence; while their daughter is all the Christian graces combined. Even if I were a nervous young woman, I could not fail to feel safe here."

They said no more, and Hardy, who had not even the most languid interest in them or their affairs, soon forgot them altogether.

My hero's sentimental reveries were not of a nature sufficiently intense to banish slumber. He slept like a top, and was wakened early by the village boys driving the cows afield. The sharp tinkling of the cow-bells, the deep breathing of the cows as they lingered to crop the thick grass beneath his window, the shouting of the little barefooted drivers, and the vociferous barking of a small dog in attendance, made a chorus which would have waked the Seven Sleepers.

As the sunrise was at an end, and the thin, cracked bell, swinging high in the wooden tower of a queer, lank structure at the side of a hill not far away, announced the hour of worship; and in answer to its summons the dwellers in the village and outlying farms began to wend their way, at a sober, Sunday pace, to "meeting." Why should'n't I go to meeting too?" thought Hardy, and immediately took his hat and went down.

At the door he found the landlord in his shirt-sleeves, sitting with his chair tilted back against the wall and his spectacles on his nose, reading the weekly paper. He brought his chair down with a bang, and, pulling off his glasses, inquired of his guest,

"Goin' to meetin'?"

"I think I shall. Do you go, Sir?"

"No, guess not, this mornin'. Dreadful, dreadful busy, guess, though. You go right into the meetin'-house, and Deacon Goldthwaite 'll show you up pew."

Hardy thanked him and walked away. On reaching the church-door he found that the deacon did seem to know at once that he was a stranger, and to be shown to the Eunice pew; for, after bowing with his best manners to him and nodding significantly, he went tip-toeing up the broad aisle and motioned the young man to a seat. One other person already occupied the head of the pew, and as Hardy seated himself by the door he found himself opposite a young lady. She, perhaps his look expressed a shade of the surprise he felt, as he said to himself, "Can this be the landlord's daughter?" She looked it.

The stranger appeared to be about twenty, and had the unmistakable air of a lady. Hardy, who was critical, noted approvingly the pure rose-leaf complexion, the small firm mouth, the low sweet forehead, and the dark, soft, wavy hair, and pronounced her a beauty also. Her eyes were turned from him, but he felt sure they were gray. Her dress them no information, being as much in the dark as themselves.

"Is it really so, Ada?" Mrs. Barlow asked. "I fancied, from the way you listened, that you recognized the voice."

It did seem to me that I had heard that voice before," replied Ada, "but I have not the faintest idea as to who its owner can be.

She blushed slightly; perhaps she was conscious that her words, though perfectly true in fact, contained a slight evasion; for well she remembered when and where she had heard that voice before. Instantly its sound had brought back to her mind the pleasant hour she had spent a year ago, the pretty village, the queer little church with its rustic congregation, the stranger who had knelt with her the liturgy side-book, and even the pleasant, dark eyes that had looked down for a moment into hers. But she was not disposed to enter her reminiscences with the present company.

"I Plague take the strolling singer!" exclaimed Mrs. Barlow to herself. "I could set a dog on him with pleasure, for the mischief he has done." But why in the name of common-sense couldn't Izunt ever be ready with a little graceful turn of that sort? To be sure, he couldn't do the pleasebandour style with his bass voice, splendid as it is. It takes a tenor for that kind of thing."

Perhaps I may as well mention here that Mr. Hunt married Laura Hathaway the following Christmas. He fully believes how the evening spent at Lake Lucerne could have suited him; and has not the slightest idea that my agency but his own will was instrumental in bringing about a result which has made him the happiest of men.

III.—THREE TIMES, AND OUT.

It was a little past sunset when the steamer from Flitsburg touched at the little pier at C——, and one of her passengers, learning that she would be detained until midnight in taking on freight, thought he might appropriately spend the interval of waiting in a stroll about the town. The passenger, who was no other than our friend Laurence Hartley, was on his way to Cincinnati, to act as groomsman at a wedding; on which occasion he was to have for his partner Miss Clara Avery, that very dark-eyed enchantress of whom we found him dreaming a year ago. The two were now formally betrothed, and their marriage was to take place in the autumn.

Indulging in a lover's reverie, Hartley strolled a long time about the moonlit streets, and was returning to the landing through what seemed the private lane that ran along the water-side. He was sauntering slowly on in the shadow of some gardens, when he was caught the rising notes of a guitar, and, looking through an opening in the shrubbery, he beheld the musician—a young girl, a light-flowing dress, seated on the outmost recess of a window opening into a brilliantly lighted parlor. Her face was turned from him, but he could see the outline of a graceful head; and the little hand, hovering over the strings, showed like a lily in the moonlight. In a moment she began to sing; and, to his surprise, Hartley recognized the voice of the stranger in the little church of Bonair. There could be no mistake. The voice was one in a thousand—a clear, brilliant soprano, with a little light quiver in it, giving a certain sympathetic quality which left its echo in the heart as well as the ear. Hartley was not an accurately fond of music, and he was in a mood to particularly enjoy whatever savored of romance or sentiment. He listened breathlessly to it, and as the last strain melted away a sudden impulse prompted him to reply. As he proceeded to do saw, with amusement, that the company within the room were listening intently. He knew that he sang well, and he was doing his very best.

"I would give something," he said, as he finished his lay, and turned to resume his walk, "to know if she recognized my voice as quickly as I did hers. It is hardly likely, I fear. But who can she be? I will certainly ask her next time I see her. I have a presentiment that I shall sing with her again. Three times, and out! they say."

At this moment, and while he was still some distance from the levee where the boat lay, he heard a whistle and the rush of the paddles in the water. He darted forward and ran swiftly to the landing, but, on reaching it, found that he was five minutes too late. The boat was three lengths from the shore, and receding so rapidly down the stream as to render vain any effort to signal her.

How Hardy cursed his own folly in dallying to sing serenades to a stranger when time was so precious! If he had not loitered by that fatal garden-gate he would have reached the levee in season to step on board the boat. There was no other boat until the next day at noon; he must either wait for that, or drive twenty miles across the country to the next railroad station, where he could catch a morning train for Cincinnati. He chose the latter plan, and gained the train, but only to encounter fresh detentions—a damaged bridge, an encumbered track—no danger; only fatal delay. Miss Clara Avery, had been gone twenty-four hours.

But the worst was yet to come. Hartley had failed to appear at the wedding it became necessary to supply his place as groomsman. The choice of a substitute fell on Alfred Talmore, a young lawyer from St. Louis—a handsome fellow, with a killing pair of eyes, a pretty turn for sentiment, the ability to waltz all night without flagging, and any amount of assurance. Clara's facile fancy was caught. In a week she had transferred to him the whole small stock of her affections; and when, at the end of a fortnight, Hartley, again delayed by business, managed to join the bridal party at Niagara, Miss Avery was engaged to his rival.

He was not a man to contest the possession of such a woman's heart. He effected neither reproach nor remonstrance, but proudly renounced all claim upon her, and departed in the very next steamer for Europe.

But the poor fellow was hard hit. He had honestly loved the shallow and selfish beauty, and, moreover, he had believed in her; and it is a sore thing to have all one's dearest illusions, as well as hopes, shattered at once. If he had been compelled to work for his living he would very likely have found a speedy cure in employment; but, fortunately, he had an ample amount of leisure in which to brood over and magnify his sorrows. He rambled over Europe, seeking to fill up the most conspicuous places in his wretched life, and finding a kind of dismal solace in the thought that he was a man to whom fate had let a young man be ever so great a sufferer from the griefs of love, there was no remedy for him. He began to sleep sound o' nights, and to have some relish for a beef-steak. So when, at the end of two years, Hardy called on the old associations of his parents and returned home, he was really not wholly miserable. He had, indeed, begun to call himself in a "slightly heling." He was fond of running off the gas and sitting alone in the window on moonlight nights; if he heard what a hollow world we live in; and of believing that for him the dream was dreamed, the race was run, and lost. His way was upward, I admit; but then his wound had been deep, and had not laid on any healing plaster for years.

He was a little annoyed, on first reaching home, to find a guest in the house, a friend of his sister Ada. On being presented to Miss Ada Morris, he noticed merely a quiet and very self-possessed young lady in black mourning dress, but rather listless attentions with languid indifference; and he could not have told, after the first few words, whether she was pretty or fair, handsome or plain. He found her very little in his way, however, for Ada, during the first few days, was pervious and their own circle of gay associates, with whom he fancied that he had little in common. They seemed to have no claim on him; and so, though he was careful to pay Miss Morris such attentions as were due to a stranger, he really saw very little of her, and was not at all attracted by her. She, on her part, was by no means fascinated with her brother's friend. She thought him rather a dull and uninteresting young man, too self-absorbed and reserved to be agreeable, and, after the first day or two, took little notice of him in any way.

One evening, however, early, and so the family were alone—Mr. and Mrs. Hardy sat reading by the parlor fire; Julia and her friend Miss Morris in the recess of the window in low tones; while Laurence, in a small, unlighted room adjoining, was at the piano, playing and singing, with the door open. Old Mr. Hardy laid aside his book and turned to Miss Morris.

"Ada, my dear, I am not intending to give us our Sunday evening music?"

"Certainly, my dear, if you wish it. I am sure Mr. Laurence will be happy to please you."

"Oh, I'll play as long as you like," Laurence, who had not lost his passion for music, listened curiously. He had quite enough of the gusto left to be aware that the player had the soul of a musician, and that her touch was true and delicate, and that her cultivated, sweet voice was perfectly well chosen. It was very pleasant, peaceful music; and Laurence, sitting there unseen, fell under the influence of a mood that was new to him. At the end of half an hour Miss Morris rose from the instrument.

"Pray, do not go yet, my dear child," said the old gentleman. "Sing me something first."

She replied to herself, and Laurence wondered lightly over the keys for a moment, as if of their own accord, the sweet old words of a well-known tune, and in an instant she began to sing:

"Time grows out old with length of years."etc.

At the third line she was joined by a fine, full tenor, which poured the slowly fainted from behind her. She started at the sound, and turned her head. Laurence had risen from the piano, and the third verse Laurence Hardy emerged from the shelter of the inner room, and stood leaning against the doorway, still crooning his part of the tune, and looking attentively at Miss Morris, who, with her head turned over her shoulder, was looking at him.

The song came to a dead stop as the two singers, as if by mutual understanding, came hastily forward. They met half-way, the gentleman clasping warmly the extended hand of the lady.

"Miss Avery!" he exclaimed, in a voice of surprise and delight at once. "And was it really you?" she asked; while he exclaimed, "Three times, and out! I knew it could not fail."

The rest is quickly told. When two young people pass at once from a chance meeting to a love scene, they do not take them long to become lovers. The course of their true-love ran as smooth as Sandy Seeds, and the wedding took place in the following June. When it was over, the happy pair started for a tour in Canada—or, perhaps, think you? Not to Paris. St. Petersburg, nor even to Newport or Long Branch. They chose romantic mountain-locked Vermont; and one Saturday afternoon, just as the sun was setting, drove quietly into the village of Bonair, Bonair, Benton, where "Bunce's Tavern" received them under its hospitable shelter.

The next morning was sweet, dewy, and fresh, as that other June morning our young friends remembered so well. Nothing about the place was changed. The same, or what seemed the same, mild-faced cows came, with their tinkling bells, to be milked in the same little yard inclosed in the farm-yard, and the same birds sang in the orchard. The little crooked bell rang for service from the queer tower of the old church, and the same people went by in, I verily believe, the self-same Sunday clothes to meeting.

Our travelers went to meeting too; it was what they had come for. Deacon Goldthwaite, with many nods, showed them to the Bunce pew —only now they sat, not in opposite corners, but closely side by side. The only change they saw was the happy one of their relation to each other.

The preacher droned out the lesson of the morning, and announced the hymn. Deacon Goldthwaite rose from his seat: and once more, standing side by side and holding the same book, Laurence and his wife joined their voices with the rest of the congregation. Of all tunes in the world, it was "Hebron" that they sang! The very same old Montgomery's, but the more familiar ones of Dr. Watts; and no one who had been looking at our friends that night but would have seen the brown eyes and the gray seek each other quickly, and with a very peculiar expression, at the singing of the first verse:

"Time far the Lord hath led me on."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A NEW mass of masonry and sundry gigantic engineering appliances have been added on the Brooklyn Bridge, which indicate that the solid foundation for the great East River Bridge is being laid as rapidly as possible. The tremendous cost of the structure has not yet been found, and it is hoped that the Brooklyn pier may be finished in two years. The construction of the New York pier, at the foot of Roosevelt Street, will soon be commenced.

The Superintendent of the Census expects to make public the complete population of the country early in October. By the first of September the population of each of the States will be known. Then for the indications are that the increase during this decade has been less than in the decade preceding it.

An immense railway bridge has been erected over the Danieper, near Kiev. It is the longest in Europe, being 2903 feet in length, and consisting of twelve arches.

London is considered the hottest, and Liverpool the coolest city in England.

A short time before the commencement of the European war the Prussian Government received a letter from a young Austrian, who boldly stated that he was gifted with a voice that was in a high degree rare in Germany, and which has been given him by the direct intervention of humanity. He therefore requested to be sent for a course of 5000 francs, and a student's entry at the Paris Academy of Music. The letter was accompanied by a copy of a very handsome young man.

Most of the pretty and curious convenits sold by dealers at Paris are manufactured in convent workrooms. The spar-rock jewelry comes from abroad, and much of the "Indian work" is made by Yankees and others who live in that Region.

In too many fashionable American families there is comparatively little regard paid to the comforts and pleasures of servants, but a great outlay of money made for personal adornment, parlor decorations, and elaborate suppers whatever the so-called "claims of society" demand it. The most cultivated circles of Paris lead society in quite a style where simplicity would surprise many an ambitious matron. Coffee and tea form the refreshment, if any is offered at all. Bouquets are rarely seen on the table, and are gracefully disposed vases of flowers ornament the rooms. The President of the University of Paris, Deon, Bonheur, and Fiez, Madame De Gasparin, and many of the leading men and women, at dinner-parties, where a leg of veal is the pièce de resistance, and a bright-faced girl is waiter, have been received with marked attention, and been admitted to the most intellectual and cultivated circles of the French capital, not specially actuated by the extravagance of the court, or the dull pomp of moneyed bourgeoisie, but by refined, simple-hearted and exclusive, while observes a marked simplicity.

A portrait of Luther, painted by Lucas Cranach, was discovered not long ago in the house of a peasant in Thuringia. Between the chair and cobwebs, in a passage leading from a church in Reichenbach to a school room. This portrait is considered the best in existence.

It is related of the French Emperor that when he left Paris for the army he declined to have a bed provided for him. A general remarking that it was an unnecessary denial, he carelessly replied: "What is the use? We are going to a country where we shall probably meet with houses enough, but the enemy shall probably meet with houses enough, but the enemy shall probably meet with houses enough, but we shall always have a clock to cover us." It has been ascertained since that the Emperor was provided with the Empress's own personal outfit—carriages, cooks, beds, sofas, and all the rest.

It has been decided to remove the body of Rossini from Paris to the Church of Santa Croce, at Florence, where the remains of Dante, Michael Angelo, Forsyth, and other illustrious Italians are interred. Madame Rossini is stated to have given her consent.

During the past year over four hundred persons have been arrested by the officers of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in this city, and the information of cruelty to animals, and the information of cruelty to children. Of those convicted and punished. Over fifty horses, not permanently disabled, have been condemned. Since the last report of the treasurer of this society three legacies have been bequeathed to it, amounting, in the aggregate, to seven thousand dollars; and since May 18, 1870, the sum of eight thousand dollars has been received toward the purchase of a building for the society.

An honest writer in The Queen remarks that none will be very much inclined to dispute that this is an age of shams, and that we deceive so openly. We carry out the little social deceptions of life with the same gusto that the more serious deceptions of life with the same gusto that the more serious deceptions of life with the same gusto that the more serious

SCENE IN NANCY.

THE sketch on this page represents an incident which occured during a halt of French troops on their way through the picturesque old town of Nancy. A soldier, in heavy marching order, stands in the midst of a group of towns-people, who are pulling him about with the greatest interest, examining his Chassepot, and all his trappings. In the background is the fine old gate known as the Porte de la Grafle.

STUDYING A WAR MAP.

THE Parisian street scene represented on this page is one which Americans are only too well able to understand and to sympathize with. It seems but yesterday since we were tracing the course of our own armies by means of newspaper war maps, and trying to understand the strategy of the generals, and to predict the course of the campaign. In Paris, says Figaro, the art of "popular strategy" has been brought to great perfection, by means of maps and colored flags. Many an amateur general has shown the way to best MOLTKE, cross the Rhine, and march to Berlin, and, doubtless, since the defeat at Weissenburg, has thought it a pity that he had not been in M'MAHON's place. One of these amateur military geniuses, says Figaro, who was recently dining out, brandished his fork in the heat of discussion, exclaiming, "I shall fall upon the right wing and the left flank!" To which the mistress of the house, whose whole soul was absorbed in the task of carving chickens, answered, "Why, then, you want at least half a fowl." This amusement is, probably, not so popular in Paris now as it was a month ago; but we can imagine the painful anxiety with which the war maps are daily studied by the Parisians, as the apparently resistless tide of German invasion rolls nearer and nearer.

EGYPTIAN BURIALS.

THE most curious, if not the most useful, of the arts of Egypt, was that by which they disposed of their dead. It was the will of the Egyptians to have their bodies, or the principal portions of them, preserved as long as possible from decay; and this was effected so successfully that the slightest of to-day may examine the corpses of men and women over whom thousands upon thousands of years have rolled without bringing to them corruption, or depriving them of the human form. Indeed, we know of no limit to the endurance of the mummy if left in Egypt, the climate for which it was prepared. The processes (for there were three processes) of embalming required from two to three months to complete them. The body was never embalmed whole. Some portions were always removed, and not always, there is reason to suppose, preserved; but commonly the separated portions were preserved by themselves and placed in jars. The exterior body was then filled with myrrh, cassia, and other gums, and after that saturated with natron. Then there was a marvelous swathing of the embalmed form, so artistically executed that professional bandagers of the present day are lost in admiration of its excellence. "According to Dr. Granville, there is not a single form of bandage known to modern surgery of which examples are not seen in the swathings of the Egyptian mummies. The strips of linen have been found extending to 1000 yards in length. Rosellini gives a similar testimony to the wonderful variety and skill with which the bandages have been applied and interlaced." The exclusion of the air from the surface of the body was the object of this patient labor, and every proper expedient was resorted to to make the cerements fit tightly. Not the large limbs only, but the fingers and toes have been separately bandaged in the more elaborate mummies. The body was generally labeled, having its card, so to speak, placed within the linen folds, and generally on the breast. The identification was usually a plate of metal engraved, but sometimes it was a small image of a god, or an animal, with the name of the mummy on it, and this has been found sometimes within the body. Beads, ear-rings, necklaces are frequently turned out from among the wrappings. The bandaging effected, the next thing was to fit the mummy's surtout, which was made of layers of cloth pasted or glued together till they formed a pasteboard. Before it could be called a board, however—that is to say, while it was yet moist and pliable—it was placed about the wearer, whose shape it was made to take accurately. As soon as the artist was satisfied with the fit, the garment was sewn up at the back, and then allowed to harden. A mask, representing the features of the deceased, was put over the head, and continued some way over the shoulders. Male mummies were a reddish-brown, and female a yellowish-green mask, as a rule; but the faces of some mummies, and sometimes even their whole surfaces, were gilded over. Commonly the pasteboard case was painted in bright colors, whose brilliancy was as lasting as the mummy itself. Hieroglyphics were emblazoned on it, and it was in some instances stuck over with beads and spangles. The legend would describe the departed, or include a prayer or invocation. The mummy was thus complete, but it was boxed up afterward in three coffins made to follow its shape as nearly as could be.

THE PRINCE'S BAPTISM.

"Louis has had his baptism of fire."
Emperor's Telegram.

"How jolly, papa! how funny!
How the bells now tumble about!
Hurraa! there's a fellow's head off—
How the pretty red blood spouts out!

"And look, what a jolly bonfire!
Wants nothing but colored light!
Oh, papa! burn a lot of cities,
And how in the next one at night.'

"Yes, child, 'tis operatic,
But don't forget, in your glee,
For your sake this play is playing—
That you may be worthy me.

"They baptized you in Jordan water—
Baptized as a Christian, I mean;
But you come of the race of Cæsar,
And this is how their baptisms been.

"Baptized in true Cæsar fashion,
Remember through all your years
That your law was a burning city,
And your water its widows' tears."

SYDNEY SMITH'S WIT.

SYDNEY SMITH'S style in reviewing was not criticism like Jeffrey's. It was the laughing, rollicking nonsense of a man of rare wit and imagination talking about the book with a pen in his hand exactly as he talked about it in his own easy-chair at Foston or at his table in Green Street. "Lightness and firmness," he said to me, "are my style in reviewing;" but thousands of readers read Sydney Smith's nonsense who never thought of cutting the leaves to look at a page of Jeffrey's metaphysics or Brougham's polities. Of the Roman hand is generally distinguishable in the first sentence. His description of Dr. Parr's wig, for instance, trespassing a little on the orthodox magnitude of criticism in the anterior parts, but scorning even episcopal limits behind, and swelling out into boundless convexity of fun, was the comparison of the bishop's huge wig with the style of his sermons—his account of the Society for the Suppression of Vice as a society for suppressing the vices of people with incomes of less than £500 a year—his suggestion that Mr. Wakefield's illustration of a remarkable species of monkey was the head of a master in chancery, and his criticism upon the blunderings of travelers thus trifling with science and natural history—his description of the bon constrictor swallowing the tortoise whole, shell and all, and consuming him slowly in the interior, as the Court of Chancery does a great estate—are all in the exact style of his talk. Here is an example of the way in which he gathered up in his recollection the last of incidents to exemplify the pleasures of life in the tropics, and threw them out in an avalanche of wit: "To these roses lays the foundation of a tremendous ulcer. In a moment you are covered with ticks. Chigoes bury themselves in your feet, and lay there a huge colony of young chigoes in a few hours. They will not live together; but every chigoe sets up a separate ulcer, and has his own private colony and pus. Flies get entry into your mouth, into your eyes, into your nose: you eat flies, drink flies, and breathe flies. Lizards, cockroaches, and snakes get into your bed; ants eat up the books; scorpions sting you on the foot. Centipedes bite, bites, stings, or bruises; every second of your existence you are wounded by some new and unnatural life that nobody has ever seen before, except Swammerdam and Merian. An insect with eleven legs is swimming in your tea-cup; a bird, described with nine wings is struggling in the small beer; or a caterpillar with seventy-seven eyes in his belly is hastening over the bread and butter! All nature is alive, and seems to be generating all her entomological hosts at once in you, as you are standing, out of your coat, waistcoat, and breeches. Such," he says, reflecting upon his own description, "are the tropics, and all this, of course, may well reconcile us to our dews, fogs, vapors, and drizzle—to our comparative rushing about with gargles and tinctures—to our old British constitutional coughs, sore throats, and swelled faces." His whimsical note to Lady Grey, beseeching her to put up my lord's pistols and powder-flasks out of the reach of a fit of the finest wit: "For God's sake do not drag me into another war! I am worn—battered and worn out, with crusading and defending Europe, and protecting mankind; I must think a little of myself. I am sorry for the Spaniards—I am sorry for the Greeks—I deplore the fate of the Jews; the people of the Sandwich Islands are grunning under the most detestable tyranny; Bagdad is oppressed—I do not like the present state of the Delta—Tibet is not comfortable. Am I to fight for all these people? The world is bursting with sin and sorrow. Am I to be champion of the deranged, and to be eternally raising fleets and armies to make all men good and happy? We have just done saving Europe, and I am afraid the consequence will be that we shall cut each other's throats. No war, dear Lady Grey! no eloquence; but apathy, selfishness, common-sense, arithmetic!"

Sydney Smith's conversation was the conversation of a man mad with spirits—of a man, to use his own expression, who must either talk, laugh, or burst; the conversation of a man whose intellect bred analogies and picturesque imagery as the sun breeds clouds. Take him where or where you might, you never took him by surprise; and most of the brightest illustrations of his wit, like Douglas Jerrold's, were those that he struck out on the spur of the moment. His reply, for instance, to the beautiful girl who complained, "Oh, Mr. Sydney, this pea will never come to perfection," "I dare permit me to lead perfection to the pea," is in its style perfect. Even French wit and chivalry has never excelled that; and in the Court of Louis XIV. it would have been crowned with a cardinal's hat. There was a touch of the courtier as well as of the wit in his reply to the lady who, arguing in a large party that it was always high tide at London Bridge at twelve o'clock, appealed to him with, "Why, Mr. Smith, is it not so?" "It used not to be so, I believe, formerly, but perhaps the Lord Mayor and Aldermen have altered it lately." Such, without the analogies of things with marvelous quickness. Of a couple of fools he said: "There is the same difference between their tongues as between the hour and the minute hand: one goes ten times as fast, and the other signifies ten times as much." "If you must-beat a sailor for not doing his duty, why should you not whip your coachman for refusing to pay tithes?" Of a poet who wrote with great labor—"How is Rogers' Clytie?" "He is not the very well." "Why, what is the matter?" "Oh, don't you know he has produced a couple of eggs?" When our friend Sydney tired of a couplet, with infinite labor and pain, he takes to his bed, has straw laid down, the knocker muffled, expects his friends to call and make inquiries, and the answer at the door invariably is, 'Mr. Rogers and his little couplet are as well as can be expected.' When he produces an Alexandrine, he keeps his bed a day longer."

Combining a vivid imagination with this brilliant gift of hitting upon analogies, with these high spirits, and this remarkable fluency of conversation, Sydney Smith was, as a talker, irresistible; and, indeed, Macaulay, as compared with him, was great at a table into silence. His habit was to fire right across the table, and to talk upon any subject that happened to be started, without leaving anything of his own. Unlike most wits, he owed none of his reputation to the fact that people had repressed his spirits, as it did Byron's; and when he had drunk nothing but a glass of barley-water, he was in his highest spirits. People were his happiest hours of inspiration; and the slightest hint was all he required to begin playing away with them in his imagination, and adorning them with the flowers of his fancy. And you could generally trace back the style to its first process of manufacture. That was one of the happiest of his illustrations: "A woman is just like an electric eel; you touched it, and it flashed out in sparkling concussions at the touch. The electric eel was not to be had, so Sydney touched upon American birds. "My dear Rogers," says Smith, "if we were both in America, we should be shot and feathered; and, lovely as we are by nature, I should be an ostrich and you an emu. The first physical epoch in a young country is excavation on the sight of St. Paul's; fancy a letter by the Owen of some future day, with the thigh-bone of a Minor Canon, or the tooth of a dean—the form, qualities, the knowledge, tastes, perceptions, he would discover in them." It was in this spirit that, picturing the embarrassments of the London Corporation, he drew his sketch of the bullets seizing on the sir-pump, the exhausted receiver, and galvanic batteries, and choking the progress of modern improvement in the quadrangle. His list of tortures—booming in the Times, Morning Chronicle, and Herald—his send years to conversations between Caroline and Emily, where Caroline should always give wrong information in chemistry, and Emily, in rhyme, be unable to distinguish an acid from an alkali; and Macaulay to have false dates and facts of the reign of Queen Anne forced upon him, and all liberal and honest opinions ridiculed in his character, and not shut out from answering in their defense, was thrown off in a conversation at Romilly's on the tortures that Dante had inflicted upon his enemies. Sydney suggested the Utilitarians. "That man is so hard," says Smith, speaking of Bentham, "that you could not get him into the Westminster Reviewers, "that you might drive a broad-wheeled wagon over him, and it would produce no impression; if you were to bore holes in him with a gimlet, I am convinced he would not feel one of them." To end his school treat mankind as if they were mere machines; the feelings or affections never enter into their calculations. If every thing is to be sacrificed to utility, why do you bury your grandfather at all? why don't you cut him into small pieces at once, and make potable soup of him?"

TO THE LADIES.

"I CAN inform any one interested of hundreds of Wheeler & Wilson Machines in daily use, that wear that to-day are in better working condition than one entirely new. I have often driven one of them at a speed of eleven hundred stitches a minute. I have repaired fifteen different kinds of sewing machines, and I have found yours to wear better than any other. With ten years' experience in sewing machines of different kinds, yours has stood the most and the severest tests for durability and simplicity."—GEO. L. CLARK, Lymdenville, N. Y.

INQUIRE WITHIN.

THE mouth is like a house to let. However pretty it may be externally, it is impossible to judge of its merits until you have seen the inside. If behind the ruby doors there are plenty of pearl-white fixtures, you will exclaim at once, "How beautiful!" To impart the utmost possible brilliancy, there is nothing like fragrant SOZODONT.

"SPALDING'S GLUE" mends every thing. —[Com.]

EARTHLY TREASURES.

FROM THE FRENCH OF MADAME SOUDAIS.

Tue pure soul responds to heaven's eternal day;
The angels most
And guide it far along the cloud-wrapped way,
And whisper sweet:

"Young angel! wherefore thus a thought of woe
Of sorrow keep?
Hark, seraphim above!" "I hear below
My mother weep."

Still on they sweep; the darkened priest is heard,
By the altar's side;
Sad parents! see depart your summer bird,
Your joy, your pride.

Like faithless birds are all earth's beauteous things;
Even while they stay
Tremble! They best insensately when wings
To fly away.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY.

THE President has issued his proclamation of neutrality, which will be most unanimously respected. It quotes the substance of the neutrality laws, states the attitude of Prussia and France in regard to neutrals since the breach of Paris of 1856, to which they were both parties, and the stipulations of our existing treaties with Prussia. It all defines the acts against the commission of which it warns the citizens of the United States. It is a most timely and proper document. The people of this country, without ever sympathies, comprehend not only the advantage, but the reason of neutrality, in the wars of other nations. But it is very amusing to observe that those who have violently taken side in sympathy with Louis NAPOLEON in the present war vehemently insist that a proclamation of neutrality during the present war would be a gratuitous insult to our opinion of the merits of the case. Meanwhile the President duly says in the proclamation: "The free and full expression of sympathy in public and private is not restricted by the laws of the United States;" and, undoubtedly, this will as plainly appear in every future stage of the war as it has appeared from the beginning.

But while from the beginning the conduct of LOUIS NAPOLEON in declaring a war totally without reason has been indignantly censured by the moral sentiment of the United States, the censure has been just, and is not now, accompanied by any hostile feeling to the people of France. That they should distinctly understand such a feeling must be unjust than to describe the American feeling of satisfaction with the German successes as one of pleasure in the French reverses. The satisfaction is due to the conviction that German success is declarative of the continued dominance of LOUIS NAPOLEON in France, and that Belgravia and Metz have forever dissipated the fatal delusion that hung around the name of BONAPARTE. The German success is hailed because it is believed to be, not the humiliation, but the emancipation of France, and the progress of the German arms has been most warmly welcomed by those who would most stoutly oppose any German claim to an unjust settlement of the war.

LOUIS BLANC says that the overthrow of that war, the defeat of the French, the presence of the enemy upon the soil of France, the menaced capital, unite in making an emergency in which the French people must stand fast and together.

That, indeed, is the fatal necessity of the situation. But, as he says, "Personal resentment in advance [against the war] and repulsion it now," why did she not repudiate the author of the war, instead of rising with enthusiasm to his support? The fact undoubtedly is, that the French do not love the Germans, but they would not have gone to war to gratify that dislike. Yet LOUIS NAPOLEON, wishing to strike at BISMARCK, felt that he could count upon that latent hostility of the French. The result proves that he was not deceived. And even now the fall of LOUIS NAPOLEON in French regard is not due to his guilt in beginning a causeless war, but to his conspicuous and contemptible incapacity.

Nevertheless, it is a war into which France has been surprised; and to demand of a nation a kind of moral heroism that could not be expected of an individual is folly. The French people may be sure that, while no honorable observer can wish to see them successful in promoting the selfish schemes of LOUIS NAPOLEON in defeating the army of a nation which a French army unjustly proposed to invade, yet the circumstances are such that there can be no pleasure in the mere fact of French defeat. The Germans can not, indeed, retire, unless compelled to do so, because the terms upon which they withdrew would press on to the invasion of their country. When war upon so tremendous a scale is once begun, it must be fought out to an end. In the present state of feeling in France, to propose to treat with the Germans would be to invite instant immolation. Even LOUIS BLANC, the Republican exile of twenty years, not only does not suggest it, but declares that it is impossible. The position of the people of this country, therefore, is peculiar. They must heartily wish the Germans to beat, yet they can not wish the French beaten, except as the army of Cæsarism. For it is true, and it may yet appear, that the German victory will be the most signal service to the French people.

NO TERRITORIAL CESSION BY TREATY.

THE great success of the German army at the opening of the war shows beyond a doubt that the German military system is superior to that of France, and that the French were curiously unprepared for the struggle. The electrical series of victories has rudely shaken the military prestige of France, and it is one of the revenges of fate that a reform which was carried to the highest point by the first NAPOLEON should be apparently utterly lost under the last. It is a natural consequence of this that sudden and decline of military reputation that propositions for a settlement should be advanced which involve the cession of part of the present territory of France to Germany. If the French army had pushed on to Berlin, and the Germans had been defeated in every battle, we know very well what would have been the terms demanded by LOUIS NAPOLEON. He would have required, first, that the declared cause of the war should be removed by the agreement of KING WILLIAM that no HOHENZOLLERN should sit upon the Spanish throne, even if the Spanish people elected him king; and, second, that the Rhenish provinces should be surrendered to France.

But what could possibly demand as a settlement? Certainly she might ask the removal of the BONAPARTE dynasty, and the expenses, or part of the expenses, of the war. Europe and the United States would approve such terms as neither harsh nor extravagant; and if Germany were content to leave them, the position and power would be of the boldest kind. But it is evidently believed that, as successful France would have required the Rhenish provinces, so successful Germany will insist upon Alsace and Lorraine. Many journals have already declared it a result worthy of victory proper; that these provinces were originally German; that the natural frontier of France is the Vosges Mountains, and not the Rhine; that, indeed, there have been, as usual, political reasons offered why the victor should do what he chooses. But the remark attributed to BISMARCK is no chastisement of the sagacity of that remarkable man—remarkable because he so thoroughly comprehends the power and genius of his country—that it may not be true. He says that Prussia seeks no territorial aggrandizement. It does not say, however, that she would refuse it; and, doubtless, if Alsace and Lorraine came naturally to Germany, BISMARCK would not object.

Is that likely? Reasonable persons will agree; and we hope, therefore, that the public opinion of Europe will demand that the territorial question in the settlement be left upon the only true principle, that of popular consent. We have been surprised to perceive that the Tribune apparently regards Alsace and Lorraine as they might be disposed of by treaty between the two Governments at Berlin and at Paris. Indeed, in this respect the general tone of correspondence from Europe has represented the popular feeling of the provinces as warm for the French, it has yet been intimated to argue that, being naturally German, they could be properly allotted to Germany. Now the facts in regard to Alsace and Lorraine are very simple. They are undoubtedly, and especially Alsace, largely German in race and language and tradition. But they are by no means entirely so. The provinces form six French departments, in five of which out of 2,383,961 inhabitants 1,859,158 are Germans. These provinces have been so identified to and fro for centuries. A large part of Alsace was confirmed to France by the treaty of Westphalia in 1648, when France had the decisive possession of it for nearly two centuries, while she has held Lorraine for more than a century.

During this time, and especially in recent years, the French Government has sought to make the provinces as French as possible. With the German instinct of race and romantic love of fatherland have, doubtless, stoutly withstood these efforts; every traveler in Alsace observes how lurks the strong German character of the country and the people. But the provinces, by mingling of population and by assimilation and subjection to the same government, have become parts of France. The French nation has fairly acquired rights in them which, in all history, while yet the facts that we have stated forbid their claim as essential, an integral part of the French nationality. They could be, indeed, that is to say, without injury to that nationality, be, therefore, undoubtedly the right of the people of those provinces, when the present order is disturbed, to decide their own destiny. That was the principle in the case of Savoy. And if, notwithstanding the events of later years, the provinces, by an honest and universal vote, decide to become again German, as they originally were, ought Europe to refuse, and to insist that they shall remain French? This would not be the territorial aggrandizement of Germany against which, as we said last week, there would be a coalition of civilization.

It is only an aggrandizement by conquest against which a protest should be made.

But whether such a cession be desirable or practicable, it is very plain that a cession by treaty is intolerable. The intelligent public opinion of the world should require that the treaties which conclude great wars should not be armed truces, but conditions of actual peace. It is clear, however, that a treaty, concluded after a series of great military defeats, if it contains an injury to national honor, is merely an armistice. From the moment it is signed the parties begin to prepare to end it. Now, without considering the reason of the case, the mutual feeling of France and Germany about the border provinces is such, that if one country should cede them to the other under the pressure of defeat in war, the surrender would rankle as a disgrace which must be removed. Hence, in the St. Thomas treaty, concluded in perfect peace between Denmark and the United States, the Government of Denmark, although St. Thomas was a remote colony, and of the slightest value to the mother country, insisted that the question of cession should be submitted to the popular vote of the island. Let Germany ask, with all the world, for the end of the BONAPARTE rule in France, and for the expense which has been forced upon her. But no cession of territory by treaty!

THE NEW PARTY.

THE Republican majority is so large in Massachusetts, and the State is so advanced in civilization, that experiments may be safely tried there which would be culpably perilous to the general cause of liberty and justice elsewhere in the country. The independent action of the Republicans who are prohibitionists is one of those experiments. We call them Republicans, because those who are interested in all questions of moral progress are usually within the Republican lines, or will be. PHILLIPS, beyond them, and, of course, these gentlemen see, what every body else sees, that their demand, involving, as it does, the Democratic party shall succeed, unless the Republican party will declare for prohibition. They know, of course, that if "moral Republicans" throughout the country should do what they have done in Massachusetts, the next Presidential election would be given to the Democrats, the late constitutional amendments would be impaired, the work of the war, as far as possible, undone, and the enemies of temperance reform would be intrenched in power. In Massachusetts, we say, this experiment may be safely tried. For whether the Republican party adopts prohibition or not—in which case MR. PHILLIPS and his associates would probably withdraw from the ticket, and urge their friends to support the Republican nominations—or whether the temperance ticket remains, the Republicans will carry the State. But if it should be supported in New York the result is evident enough.

The plea of the temperance Republicans is plain. They say, in their judgment, there is no evil in the country so fatally alarming as drunkenness, and that neither of the great parties is here ready to deal with it by a declaration of absolute determination to stop it. They are tired, they say, of the shuffling of parties, and will risk the consequences of their action. If elections in this country at this time did not involve so many precious interests, every man might, perhaps, fairly demand that his special conviction should be made the platform of his party. But, as a matter of fact, party division will only have effect upon issues that absorb the attention of the people, and the question of prohibition is not yet such a question. Perhaps it ought to be, and those who think that it is paramount to all other issues may zealously and eloquently arouse public feeling upon the subject. But until it is aroused party divisions will be drawn along other lines.

And until it is so aroused, is it the duty of good "temperance" citizens to sustain a policy which will be the most friendly or that which will be steadily hostile to their wishes? They might, indeed, form the new element of a Democratic party; but they would not, therefore, create a powerful prohibitory party. The temperance citizens say that in no other way can they make prohibition a commanding issue. But that is their radical error. Issues are not in that sense commanding made. Thus the Republican party was not the result of the determination of a part of the old Whig and Democratic parties that the non-existence of slavery should be made an issue. That question had absorbed and concentrated all other public interests. The Democrats saw it, and declared for slavery. The Whigs would not declare for or against slavery, and they were pulverized. But the great questions that have interested the country during the last ten years are not finally settled and overborne by the temperance question, as bank and tariff and internal improvement were superseded by slavery extension in 1854.

Of course, our temperance friends are free men, and they have decided their policy for themselves. In a government like ours political sagacity is proved by skill in seizing the opportunity of doing the most good. But the arguments of the third party, which we have carefully read, have thus far failed to show us the policy which directly tends to the restoration of Democratic ascendency in the country is favorable to justice, liberty, or temperance.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE WAR, AFTER GRAVELOTTE?

A DAILY paper lately asked, "Did Prussia go to war to resent an insult to German honor, to defend the unity of Germany, or to break up the unity of France?" and proceeded to argue that, if it was for the first purpose, its honor had been avenged; if for the second purpose, that German unity was no longer threatened by France; but if for the third purpose, it was beginning an endless struggle. Now Prussia went to war because LOUIS NAPOLEON'S Ministry declared war against her, and marched an immense army to the frontier to invade her. At the time the paper spoke the attempt at invasion had apparently been at first baffled by Germany. But a series of tremendous battles had been subsequently fought, leaving, as the same paper said upon another page, the French commander master of the situation and the assailant. If that was, indeed, the fact, Prussia was still menaced by the wanton attack of the French Government, and the questions were all superfluous. She was at war to defend herself against the most criminal aggression.

But, assuming that the statement of the paper was incorrect, and that the GERMANS, and not MARSHAL BAZAINE and his army, were the masters of the situation, what should the Prussian King do? Assume? If he had pursued even his head-quarters before Metz, with his victorious armies encamped upon French soil, that the French Government should abandon at once the new Government, whatever it might be, should give pledges not to renew such an abominable attempt, and pay the expenses that France would have asserted, or even patiently listened? Or, having won victories at a fearful cost of blood, was the King to assume that France was hopelessly beaten, and would behave herself, and so withdraw into his own kingdom? Or was he to invade the interior of France to the fact that she was conquered, and ask her what she had to say? It is plain that, at the paper assumed, it would be the part and the duty of the King of Prussia to propose to end the war, if he had made such a proposal, it would have been received by the Government whose sympathies were French, and by France, which believed that M'MAHON had just joined BAZAINE, in proof that he was unable longer to continue it.

Prussia went to war because she was attacked by France, and for there was no alternative against the war, as we have elsewhere stated, Prussia must therefore fight until France, by some sufficient authority, asks for a respite, or until she has gained such an overpowering advantage that she may propose it without the certainty of contemptuous refusal. There are other states propose a friendly mediation. To throw upon Prussia, while the advantage is still obscure, the responsibility of proposing a further continuance of the war is mere inanity. When the French have had enough of the war, either by reason of defeat or of the deep conviction of the great crime committed by LOUIS NAPOLEON in their name when he began it, they will probably say so. And if GRAVELOTTE, MARSHAL BAZAINE, acknowledging defeat and speaking in the name of the French Government, had asked for an armistice, with the view of proposing satisfactory terms to Germany for ending the war, there is no reason to doubt that the Prussian King would have granted it. Up to the Prussian victory at Gravelotte the German attitude in the war was irreproachable, nor have we any doubt that it will continue to be so.

THE NATIONAL INTEREST IN EDUCATION.

THE head of the Bureau of Education at Washington, the Hon. JOHN EATON, Jr., is evidently resolved that his office shall be of the utmost practical value. We have already had occasion to quote some of the deplorable statistics and facts which he has collected and published, and to bear witness to his profound conviction of the perils, and the great perils, of ignorance in the United States. There has been some hostility of feeling toward the Bureau of Education, arising from the theory that the States themselves should take charge of the whole subject. But the existence of the Bureau is justified, if only by the fact that it shows the whole country exactly how diligent or how remiss the different States are in their discharge of a most imperative common duty. In the highest sense, education is not a State matter, but a national concern. Maine is vitally interested in the schools of Florida; and nothing was more exasperating and disheartening to an intelligent American citizen of any Western State before the war than to know that education was actually forbidden to the poor laborer in all the Southern States.

The Bureau of Education has been of great service in urging upon public attention truths that are conceded as of course, but which are practically forgotten, as the facts published by the Bureau show. It is a commonplace truth, therefore, that universal education is essential to the national existence. But there are, at this moment, nearly six millions of totally illiterate adults in the United States; and adding to these the illiterate youth between the ages of ten and twenty, and children under ten who have no prospect of education, and we have four and a half millions more—a total of more than ten millions as the illiterate population of the United States. This is the result under the State system only. Is it wise, then, to refer jealousy of a national educational interest, and a national educational authority? Is there not, on the contrary, the utmost practical sagacity in the project of the bill introduced at the last session by Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts, looking to a national supervision of the whole subject, to secure the proper discharge by every State of its educational duty?

Mr. EATON, the Commissioner of Education, has just issued a "Circular of Information," which will be furnished upon application to the Bureau, the direct tendency of which is not only to diffuse the most valuable fundamental information in a way to secure and to command attention, but also to encourage a national educational esprit de corps. He has also delivered an address before the National Educational Association, at Cleveland, in which he considers the relation of the national government to education, and states distinctly what, under the Constitution, it may unquestionably do. It may provide for education in the Territories, in the District of Columbia, and upon the Indian reservations. It may do all that its international relations require, as in the exchange of documents of information, or one of the methods of raising the educational standard. It may call all persons and States to account for whatever has been intrusted to them for purposes of education. It may use the public domain, or the money received from it, for educational purposes. And what can it not do beyond this simple domestic information for the benefit of Congress and the country. For all these duties and services a national bureau is not only convenient, it is imperative.

During the late session of Congress there was an unsatisfactory debate, in the Senate, upon the relations of the national government to education. It was a debate which must be renewed again and again till the question is satisfactory; and it can result satisfactorily only in a system which, directly or indirectly, secures the education of every citizen of the United States.

UNDER WHICH KING?

As we write there is really no Government in France but General TROCHU, the Governor of Paris, and the generals with whom he has an understanding. What may be the Government, next to-morrow it is impossible to say. The fate of LOUIS NAPOLEON would be farcical, if it were possible to read of the most tragic struggle, or think of the indescribable suffering and sorrow, of which he is the wanton and guilty author, without a shudder. His imperialism is a mere Toots. He is of no importance. Nobody mentions him. Nobody cares about him. But there is a feeling of pity for one poor young boy over whom he has so ridiculously sentimentalized, and to whom he has given such bitter measures. LOUIS NAPOLEON seems to have excited neither love, nor admiration, nor confidence, nor respect. He has been the despot of France for eighteen years, and he disappears at the first blow which falls upon the country, and nobody thinks of him but to sneer at him or curse him. His career is one of the most impressive lessons in history. It has cured the French of NAPOLEON worship forever.

After the first great defeat, the Empress, the chief of the Bonapartists, said that a republic was inevitable. But it seems to be now understood that as Orleanist Government is impossible to replace the Empire. This is doubtless due to the fact that some of the best generals and ablest public men in France are Orleanists. It certainly is not due to the Orleans traditions, which are those of corruption and shameless baseness. Nor is it the result of any conviction that France is ready for Orleanist than republican Orleanist in France means constitutional monarchy. But that, if genuine, is a republic under another name. If France is ready for a really constitutional monarchy, upon the basis of universal suffrage, the form of which she now enjoys and is not likely to relinquish, then she is ready for a republic. But the republican leaders are evidently not prepared to declare it. Even LOUIS BLANC does not advise it. The reasons probably are many. It is conceived, for instance, that one of the reasons those who have all the power are not republicans. Then the organization is probably neither complete nor satisfactory. M. ROCHEFORT is not a gentleman who would be likely to be of great service to the country at this juncture. The better leaders, like M. JULES FAVRE, probably know, with M. LABOULAYE, that it is the misfortune of French republicanism not to comprehend that the nation may have any rights, and with BERANGER, quoted by a Tribune correspondent, that there is nobody for rice-President.

Moreover, there is the experience of 1848 still fresh in the memory of many of the most acute republicans. They have discovered that the republic in France is not only une et indivisible but sociale, and that upon that snag the republic of '48 was really wrecked. There is doubtless a general conviction that the monarchical form is safer for France, and from all that is known of the character of the Orleans princes, it is fair to presume that when the Count De Paris is placed upon the throne, he would be most sagaciously and patriotically advised, and that become Louis PHILIPPE followed, he would be made king, it is hard to believe that he would regret the follies and faults of his grandfather. It would be the interest, let us hope, as it would be his interest, to establish a truly popular government in France. For such a government only is "peace."

THE TROUBLES IN NORTH CAROLINA.

A CORRESPONDENT in Wilmington, North Carolina, who disapproves the late action of Governor HOLDEN, sends us a copy of the remark of Chief Justice PEARSON, that the power of the courts was exhausted, as follows:

"The Chief Justice uses such language, but not in that connection.

"He is asked by imprisoned citizens for a writ of habeas corpus. The grand jury, composed mostly of bodies of the prisoners detained by Colonel KIRK, by the order of the Governor, by the advice of the Supreme Court. Kirk declines to give up the prisoners to the Court, and the Governor is upheld by the Court of his officers' action; then the Chief Justice uses another word, which is correct, but not applicable, who likewise declines to allow the civil court to examine into the executive officers' detentions. It is at this stage of the proceeding that the Chief Justice says: 'Upon the power of the Executive I can reach; the Governor declines to obey the writ; I have no force to enforce the Governor's obedience to the law. He is the only moral force: the Governor is commander-in-chief of the militia. I can not measure moral force. But the Chief Justice also remarks that there is no obstacle to the enforcement of the law other than that raised by Governor HOLDEN'S refusal to obey. I believe to be the truth. The Governor, the Chief Justice, Judge Tourgee all say the Governor's action is the process of the Court is executed in the inurrectionary district without any hindrance save what the Governor himself has interposed."

Our correspondent is evidently mistaken in regard to the Governor's opinion, as he will, doubtless, in his reply to the Chief Justice: "To my judgment, your Honor and all the other civil and judicial authorities are ready to aid, at this time, to deal with the insurgents." The Chief Justice, in turn, submitted the power claimed by the Governor "to declare a county to be in a state of insurrection, to take military possession, to order the arrest of all suspected persons, and to do all things necessary to suppress the insurrection; but he has no power to disobey the writ of habeas corpus, or to order the arrest of any citizen simply because he is a party. The Governor, in reply, asserts that the safety of the State, which is the supreme law, requires his disregard of the writ, and that he is the sole judge for him to declare that the civil authority was powerless over the insurgents, and then to turn them over to the civil authority.

The Chief Justice states the case, it was a question whether resort to extreme measures had become necessary, and whether the Governor, under any circumstances, could suspend the writ. These are questions, of course, which must be duly but satisfactorily settled by impeachment of the Governor.

FRANCE AND REVOLUTION.

FROM EMS TO BERLIN.

THE little town of Ems—one of the most beautiful watering-places of Germany—is charmingly situated on the right bank of the river Lahn. Although it can not compete with Baden-Baden or Homburg in the magnificence of its Kursaal, the company is generally considered more select than at either of the other watering-places. It is the favorite place of resort for the royal personages of Europe, and many important political conferences have taken place there.

Among the most distinguished as well as the most constant visitors at Ems is King WILLIAM I. of Prussia, who has been accustomed to resort there every summer to recover from the fatigues of winter, when public duties press most heavily upon him. He is described as a most affable and courteous old gentleman, and a special favorite with the children of the place, with whom he unbends in the most gracious manner. The following well-authenticated anecdote will illustrate this pleasant trait in his character. A little fellow of eight or nine summers ran up to him one day, as he was walking slowly through one of the parks, and, clasping him about the knees, looked up into his face and asked,

"Are you really King WILLIAM?"

"Well, I believe so, my little man," answered the King, amused with the child's simple confidence. "What do you want of me?

"My name is WILLIAM, too, and I want to be a soldier—one of those with red facings to their uniforms, and big white feathers in their caps."

"God bless you, my little man!" replied the King, deeply moved. "When you grow up you must tell your wish to my son FRITZ, and say that old King WILLIAM gave you permission."

Nothing could have touched the soldier king more nearly than such an incident.

This summer King WILLIAM'S visit at Ems was not allowed to pass without interruption. The story of the interviews between him and Count BENEDETTI, the French Minister to Prussia, which terminated in war, shows that the French Emperor was from the first determined upon hostilities. The first audience took place on July 9, at the request of the Count, who demanded that the King should require the Prince of Hohenzollern to withdraw his acceptance of the Spanish crown. The King replied that, as in the whole affair he had been addressed only as the head of the family, and never as the King of Prussia, and had accordingly given no command for the acceptance of the candidature, he could also give no command for withdrawal. A similar interview took place on the 11th; and on the morning of July 13 the King met him on the public promenade before the fountain, and informed him that the Prince had withdrawn of his own free-will. The King regarded the affair as settled; but, to his surprise, Count BENEDETTI made a new demand, that the King should expressly pledge himself never to give his consent, in case the question of the candidature of the Prince should at any subsequent time be revived. The King decidedly refused to comply with any such demand, and when BENEDETTI returned to his proposal, with increasing importunity, stood by his answer. In spite of this, a few hours after the Count requested a third audience. Upon being asked what subject was to be considered, he gave for answer that he wished to renew the discussion of the morning. The King declined another audience, as he had no answer but that already given, and, moreover, all negotiations must now take place through the Ministry.

BENEDETTI'S rudeness in forcing himself upon the notice of the King in a public walk was regarded by those who witnessed it as a studied insult. It was interpreted as a sign of hostility toward Prussia, and two days after came the declaration of war.

The day after his final interview with BENEDETTI the King left Ems, at an early hour in the morning, in a special train for Berlin. He took leave of the crowd which had assembled to witness his departure with evident emotion. "I hope to see you all once more," said he. "God is my witness that I have not desired war; but if I am forced into it I will maintain the honor of Germany to the last man." His whole journey was like a triumphal progress. At every city and village on the way he was received with wild enthusiasm. When he arrived at Berlin the streets were thronged with people who had come out to bid him welcome. He was deeply moved by this reception. His course from the railway station to the palace, through the magnificent street of "Unter den Linden," was such an ovation as a crowned head has rarely met with in modern times. As the carriage approached the palace the pressure became so great that even the stone pillars in the public square broke off as if they had been made of wood. The ceaseless hurrahs roared like a hurricane around the palace. The King alighted on the steps, and, with deep emotion, repeatedly expressed his thanks. He could scarcely be heard for the acclamations, but those who stood nearest to him caught the words: "With such inspiration of my people, our victory is secure; we may look forward to the future without fear." The King then entered the palace, but the crowd remained. All at once the national hymn began to ascend from ten thousand voices. The people stood with uncovered heads. A small proportion only were able to sing; the others wept from excitement; and even those who took part in the hymn could do so only with trembling voice and tearful eye. It was a moment of sublime transfiguration. At length, about half an hour before midnight, the multitude were informed that the King had still many heavy tasks to attend to, and begged them to retire. "Home! home!" was at once the universal cry, and in a few minutes the vast throng had disappeared, and left not a soul in the spacious square.

Then the next day came the hurried but systematic business of preparation, the inspection of troops, and finally the marching out of the grand army to a victorious progress, of which the most sanguine had never ventured to dream.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Voyage of the "Flying Scud."—Anxiety for her Safety.—Captain Musgrave's Account.—A Shocking Spectacle.—Lonely Death of a Castaway.—The Return.—Conclusion.

In the preceding chapter our readers were informed of the departure of the Flying Scud, under command of Captain Musgrave, from Stewart Island, in search of those of the party who had been left behind at the island refuge where so many weeks months had been passed. Weak after week went by, and still no sings of the little vessel and her adventurous crew were received. At length Mr. Raynal, though hoping against hope, began to feel the keenest anxiety in regard to her fate, in which the kindhearted people by whom he was surrounded warmly sympathized. They had a fellow-townman to regret, whom they respected highly; but Mr. Raynal mourned for Captain Musgrave as for a lost brother. They were indeed nearer than most brothers. Captain Musgrave had been his true-hearted companion in many scenes of trying hardship and suffering, and now, it was only too probable, had perhaps lost his life in the attempt to rescue his comrades from the isolation and dangers of a desert island.

Happily these fears were not realized.

For in the mean time the Flying Scud, though encountering with some trying delays on account of calms, made the voyage to the island without any serious mishap of any kind. She was skillfully piloted by Captain Musgrave into the great bay, and so onward to the little land-locked harbor where the Gretchen had been wrecked, and on the shores of which their cabin was situated.

Harry was the first to see the yacht from the beach as she sailed into the harbor. He was so overwhelmed with the emotions which the spectacle of a vessel coming to their rescue awakened that he threw his arms up convulsively, and then sank fainting upon the sand. He had not strength even to call out to George to come and see. George, however, was soon found; and as soon as the men had recovered a little from the effects of their excessive joy they were taken on board the yacht, and she immediately set sail on her return.

Their voyage was delayed somewhat by contrary winds, and before they got fairly clear of the islands they were forced to seek shelter in "Sarah's Bosom," the harbor situated at the northern part of the group, as previously described.

They went on shore while anchored in this port, and in the course of their rambles among the rocks and thickets they came suddenly upon a most shocking spectacle. It was that of the dead body of a sailor, lying upon a rude bed made of moss spread upon a floor of boards, and partly sheltered by a kind of booth framed with stems of small trees and covered with boughs. He appeared to have been but a short time dead. One of his feet was enveloped in bandages, as if it had been wounded. In his hand was a slate on which the poor fellow had evidently written something, under a faint and forlorn hope, probably, of thereby conveying his last dying messages to his friends and family at home, but the writing had been so far effaced by the rain that it was not legible. They knew at once that this was the body of some shipwrecked sailor, and they afterward learned the particulars of the disaster which was the means of bringing him to this melancholy end.

As soon as wind and weather allowed they left this port, and the yacht proceeded on her way. She arrived safely at Stewart Island. The people of the village received the announcement of her appearing in the offing by a signal from a semaphore, set up for such purposes on a point of land at the entrance to the harbor. The news spread with great rapidity throughout the town; and when the yacht arrived at the landing Mr. Cross and Captain Musgrave found the whole population assembled on the wharf to welcome their return.

We have little more to add. Mr. Raynal took passage in the first vessel which sailed for Australia. Captain Musgrave, though setting out later, reached Sydney before him, having taken passage in a steamer. They learned on their arrival that the seaman whose body they had found on the shore, at the southern point of the Auckland Islands, had undoubtedly been one of the crew of the ship Invercauld, which had been wrecked on the rocks in Port Ross, or "Sarah's Bosom," as the sailors called it, during the time while they were living in their cabin in the southern part of the group. The Invercauld was a large ship of eleven hundred tons. Her company consisted of twenty-five men. Of these six went down with the wreck, and of those who escaped to the shore sixteen perished of exhaustion and famine. The three survivors, including the captain, were taken off by a Spanish brig, which accidentally came that way. They had been twelve months on the island, during the greater part of which time Mr. Raynal and his party were leading the same life of hardship and suffering in the southern part of the same group.

Each party wholly unaware that they were in so near neighborhood of another community in the same state of anxiety, suspense, and suffering with themselves. There is no question that the sailor whose dead body was found in the hut was one of their number.

Mr. Raynal closes his narrative by saying that Aleck, notwithstanding the terrible experience which he had passed through, still continued to follow the sea. George remained in New Zealand, but went to work in the gold diggings there. Harry returned to his original home in Australia, and was engaged in taking care of the flocks on a sheep farm. Captain Musgrave also settled in Australia, where he still remains. Few men have had a more eventful history. From boyhood he had a passion for the sea, and twice ran away from home to become a sailor. His father at length consented to let him follow his inclinations, persuaded that, with his restless disposition, he never would be happy at home on a farm. This was twenty years ago: and though, like a dutiful son, he has always kept up a correspondence with his parents, who live in one of the Western States of America, he has never visited his home since then. As for Mr. Raynal himself, he embraced the very first opportunity, after reaching Australia, to embark for France, where he arrived safely, after an absence of twenty years.

A SHOCKING SPECTACLE.

WEISSENBURG.

THE town of Weissenburg (printed Wissembourg on French maps), of which we give a view on our first page, was the scene of Marshal M'Mahon's crushing defeat by the Crown Prince of Prussia. It was formerly a free city of the German empire, and is situated close to the frontier, on the Lauter, a tributary of the Rhine, running into that river at or near Lauterbourg. The town was ceded to France by the treaty of Ryswick, and for six years—from 1713 to 1725—was the residence of the unfortunate STANISLAS LECZYNSKI, Duke of Lorraine and elect-King of Poland. It has more than once owed its existence for a battle-ground to the works with which its neighborhood was furnished by Marshal VAUBAN, in the reign of Louis XIV., after his conquest of Alsace. In 1706 the Marshal caused a series of redoubts and intrenchments to be constructed from the Geisberg—or, to use the French name, the "Mont du Figeonnier"—which lies at the eastern entrance of the town, above the southern bank of the Lauter, as far as Lauterbourg; and these lines have, time after time, been captured and recaptured. They were almost more than once during the War of the Succession; and on October 13, 1793, they were carried by the Austrians, under Prince WAldeck. The Germans, however, held them only for a short time, as on Christmas-day of the same year they were retaken by the French; and since that time Weissenburg has en oyed an interval of peaceful existence as the ch f lieu of the department of the Bas-Rhin. It i distant twenty-seven miles, northeast, from Strasbourg, by the railway which passes through Haguenau, seven miles from Weissenburg, and which there forms a junction with the main railway, the Great Eastern of France, leading to Lunéville, Nancy, Chalons, and Paris. The valley of the Lauter at Weissenburg forms a gorge which opens into the Rhenish plains to the south, and to the Vosges to the west. About two miles and a half to the west, upon the road to Bitche, is the hill called the Figeonnier, which rises nearly 2000 feet above the valley of the Lauter. The ground from Weissenburg to this peak for about half a mile rises gently; and then suddenly, at the bend to the right, which the road to Bitche makes, the ascent becomes more steep, so that the road is winding. The road from the Col du Figeonnier to Climbach runs through a woody country easily defended, crosses the forest of Mundat, and, after running rather more than a mile beyond, reaches the little village of Climbach, which lies on high ground. The road then descends for more than a mile to Lembach; passes through the forest of Ratzenhof, lying in a small valley, and terminates at Bitche, a fortress of great natural strength, twenty-five miles distant from Weissenburg. But the ground extending a few miles south of the Lauter, toward Saverne and Haguenau, is diversified with hills and woods, though not at all of a mountainous character. It was this tract of country, toward Neuweiler, Ingweiler, and Frischweiler, on the western side, that was unsuspiciously explored on the 26th of July by the reconnoitring party of Bieden officers, led by Count ZEPPELIN, one of whom was killed, and two became captives to the French.

THE RETURN OF THE RESCUERS.

The action in which M'MAHON was defeated, though its consequences were momentous, was rather a surprise by overwhelming numbers than a regular battle. A portion of Marshal M'Mahon's corps d'armée, two regiments of the line, one of foot chasseurs, one of mounted chasseurs, and one of Turcos, under General ABEL DOUAY, had encamped the night before close to Weissenburg. At daybreak next morning they were aroused by a violent cannonade from the hills of the Bienwald, on the opposite bank of the Lauter, whence they were attacked by a very superior German force. They fought obstinately during several hours. The Crown Prince and his staff were on the left of the German line, the artillery was in the centre, and the columns of German troops were massed on the right. The French had but three guns at first, but they got some reinforcements by railway, and maintained a brave contest till two o'clock in the afternoon. General ABEL DOUAY was killed by a shell; Brigadier MONTBRAIRE was wounded; there was great slaughter, and several hundred French soldiers, with eighteen officers, were taken prisoners; one gun was also taken.

SAARBRÜCK.

THIS little frontier town, of which we give a view on our first page this week, will be known in history as the scene of the poor little Prince Imperial's "baptism of fire." It is situated on the left bank of the river Saar (the old Roman Saravus), whence, indeed, it derives its name, which, being translated into English, is Saarbridge. It lies a little southeast of Treves, at the point where the valleys of the Saar and Salzbach meet, and is dominated by the heights of Spikeren, which, on August 2, the French carried at the point of the bayonet, and whence, an hour later, they bombarded the town. Containing about 12,000 inhabitants, Saarbrück possesses, or rather possessed, several handsome buildings, a very good college, and a large cotton-house, and was joined to its suburb, St. Johann, on the opposite bank, by a handsome stone bridge.

The country round is studded with coal-mines, but the mineral extracted is of a very poor quality, being hard, schistous, very smoky, and unproductive. Its powerful, was chiefly exported to France, being largely used on the Eastern Railway. The annual value of the exported coal has been estimated at seven millions of thalers.

Not far from here is that legendary coal-mine known as the "burning mountain," which, set on fire in 1780, still continues to burn.

The town was founded in the tenth century, and remained under the rule of the bishops of Metz until 1240, at which epoch it fell into the hands of one of the many petty princes then so prevalent. From 1380 to 1679 it belonged to the dukes of Nassau, when it was taken by the French army under the command of Turenne, but was afterward retaken and hereld by the Austrians. It fell to the share French in 1794, but was ceded to Prussia by one of the treaties of 1815.

Come, little sail, over the sea!

And half doubts it is she tourneurs "C'est lui."

And a path through the depths to her feet,
And the dark shall be bettering through,

Sweet eyes shaded by fluttering hand,
Sweet lips parted and saying "C'est lui."

CHAPTER XIII.

FISHING FOR AN INVITATION.

"WHAT a strange girl!" muttered Richard, as he stood on the rocky ledge above rock, alone, where Harry and he had first taken shelter. "What a compound of strength and weakness—as my mother says all girls are, though I never knew whom them strong before! How eager she seemed to part company with me, and how anxious to get home without me! I am never to guess now what has happened, to her father nor to Solomon! Fancy Solomon's face answering yonder, that is clear. He is neither young nor handsome —nor attractive in any way in her eyes, I reckon. And what a country she is, to be mistress of such a boor!"

The reflection that the door at the top of the rock had been left open, and the key inside it, here flushed upon him. She will be sorry about that key," he thought; "and I shall be grateful to me if I go back and fetch it. The old man will be angry that I have been trusted a stranger with such a treasure. This Trevethick must be an ingenious fellow, and a long-sighted one, no doubt. It was he who applied to Uncle Whymper for a lease of the old mine, if I remember right. Perhaps the daughter may help me to get it him, for I owe him something for his daughter's sake. The idea of his having such a thing to say to her, outside in the open air, its talk of teeth and beauty! Neither in life nor in romance have I ever seen one so fair as this girl." He meditated for a moment, and then cried out, angrily: "Heaven curse me, if I harm her! I am an ungrateful villain should I do it! If there be a Solomon, and but one man in it, I should desire to be that man!"

Then he began to climb the rock. He did not carry this time for breath nor shelter, though the wind had no whit abated, but with the skill till he reached the spot where the catastrophe which had been so near fatal to him had occurred.

"It was a narrow escape," mused he, looking down upon the place, not without a slight shudder. "What old things come into the mind at times! Death is whispering in the ear! If it had not been for my fair guide, where should I have been by this time? Beneath the sea, no doubt. But what else? How strange it seems that if there is any "else," so one, from the beginning of time till now, of all the millions who have experienced it, should have come back to tell us! And yet there was a man who came back from the grave once. Who was he? I recollect his picture by Hayden: his talk must have been better worth listening to than that of bores; for nothing true that one hears or reads, I wonder? Here is where I kissed her! I wonder if I kiss her again, if I had the chance: I swear I would not. I am a good boy now—all morality, if not religion—for they do say that lust is joyous in good intentions—which seems hard. If one is to be punished for one's wicked thoughts—even if they do not bear fruit—it is surely but reasonable that one's good ones—even if never carried into practice—should be set down on the credit side of the ledger."

With an exclamation of contempt or impatience, he turned from the dizzy sight of cliff and sea, and shouldered his way through the wind-kept doorway to the open mouth of the rock. It was a wild waste place indeed, yet not without ample indications of having been inhabited in days of old. Low but massive walls sketched out the ground-plan of many a chamber, the respective uses of which could only now be guessed at. But beneath one broken arch there was a heap of cooke steps with a stone resting on it, which Richard rightly imagined had once formed an altar. Man had worshipped there thirteen hundred years ago. Then he set off, and in the very centre of this desolate hold, there was a burying-ground, with a wall of earth about it, which neither time, nor the rude barbarism which marks our epoch, had much defaced. The archæologists had been there, of course, and discovered evidence which had attested them of the power of the monks over their fellow-creatures; but with that they had not contented. The dead had, for the most part, been left untouched in their rocky graves, to await the summons in the faith of which—and perhaps even for—they had died. For these were King Arthur's men (as Richard had read)—the warriors who had helped the blameless king "to drive the heathen and to slay the beast, to felt the forest and let in the sun."

The lonely character of the place, and its natural sublimity, combined with the recollection of his late deadly peril, tinged the young man's thoughts with an unusual seriousness; and yet he could not restrain the cynicism that was habitual to him whenever his attention was compelled to solemn subjects.

"Now, are these poor folks—whose creed must have been any thing but orthodoxy, by all accounts—all in eternal torments, I wonder, or only waiting to be so, for a few hundreds of years longer? Such was my mother's friend, Joanna's, comfortable creed, and it is shared, as I understand, by all the most excellent people. How much better (if so) would it have been for them to have been born and resided on this rock as sea-gulls! Gad, to dwell here and fight for a king about whose very existence posterity is to be in doubt in this world, and then to go to the devil! What a nightmare view of life it seems! (If, indeed, there is no thing but turned out otherwise with me, I should have solved the problem for myself. I almost wish I had. And yet it was not I when I was clinging to that wall and to the cliff yonder; and these folks would not have died if they had had reliefed on 'Another. There's something ugly in black Death that disinclines man to woo her. This wind bites to the marrow, and I'll go. Here is Gethin now, and there's an end." He turned, and walked as slowly as the blast would let him toward the gate. "And yet, if it was warmer, and summer-time," continued he, "I should like to sketch this place, and these ruins, especially if Harry were with me." He came out, and locked the door, and once more stood in the shelter of it, with the key in his hand. "Shall I be glad I went back for this, and know that it was for her sake, Gethin? Yes, I believe now—this girl—and was a lady, and all that! Or if I could choose whom I would?" He began to think about Joanna's niece; the fascinate gole forgotten; his lips escape from death memorandered; even the memory of Solomon passed his mind—the thought that monopolizes all men's minds (or nearly all) at his age. It was here that his father had died, and he was glad that he stayed about his face; it was there that he had been saved, and he was glad that he remembered. Then he fell to thinking of all that had happened between them during the few hours that were already so much a part of his life. How he had looked so frightened at first seeing him! Had he seemed to come to her aid as a "hero" as some girls say? He would ask her that some day—perhaps up yonder amidst the ruins. He was not sure that he was in sympathy with that wore when Solomon had spoken to him so roughly, or with the tone in which he had addressed her; but he was sensible more than ever of its effect upon the elder, and the gratitude with which her father had overwhelmed him. Trevethick must be a suitor who was backed by the old man, but certainly not encouraged by Harry. Was she already engaged, by-the-by, to Solomon? If it was impossible, being what she was, that she could not have been wooed by somebody.

Richard Yorke was not one of those exacting characters who demand that the object of their affections should excel in every quality but one: another he was even reasonable enough to have forgiven her for "coquetry" by having retained them, in ignorance of the existence of so unworthy admirer in himself. There are many young gentlemen who are not to be found fault with classified; and perhaps it is in despair of dealing with this Proteus that we elders so often give up here in our endeavors.

The day was darkening by the time Richard reached the village, and there was a light in only a group of miners, who stared at his bare head hard enough, but gave way to him civilly. They were talking together in whispers, and with their thick mouths with the backs of their hands. It was evident that something had "happened, tremend" in the narrow passage: and leaving their elbows on the sill of the little bar window were many, each with a pipe in his hand. "Here's Jack to Trevethick and Coe," said one, "for a parting treat."

"Ha, ha, and Trevethick" cried another, in appreciation of this commercial epigram; "Trevethick and Coe. Ha, ha, ha!"

"Trevethick and Coe. And may the copper last!"

But one, emboldened by the liquor, or naturally more audacious than the rest, put his head and shoulders through the window, and began making a trumpet of his two hands, whispered in a hoarse voice, audible to every one: "And it is it to be Coe and Trevethick after Harry —eh?"

Then the window was slammed down with no gentle hand, and the men went out laughing heartily, and for the first time leaving room for Richard to pass. He looked in, and found the bar window, but, as though he had heard nothing, walked on into the little bar-room, which had been allotted to him. It was a long, strange, since he had just heard only confirmed the suspicion already at such length entertained, that the words should give him annoyance. But they certainly did so. What was more natural than that this non-knowing daughter should be engaged to marry her father's friend—a man apparently of respectability with a prospect of doing better? What could be more natural than that such a one should be a suitor? Richard's own father, a very gentleman when he came to marry a girl—or an old woman, for that matter—with a good fortune, to be invested at such interest, especially after an acquaintance with this "Miss Harry" of about three hours at most? After a lifetime spent in such society, he seemed to strike even himself in the same light; for he grinned at the thought, and said aloud to a fool he was, and then lit his pipe. Even tobacco, however, that balm of hurt minds, did not altogether soothe his. He could think of nothing but this young girl, whose beauty had bewitched him, and to whose courage and presence of mind he owed his life. He had sworn to himself—and there was no necessity to repeat it—that he meant her no harm. Indeed, it would not be less than she deserved to ask her to be his wife. Perhaps, if she were not her father had a share, should turn out well,—she would not be so bad a match, even in point of money; but to this he did not attach much importance. He was indulging in a dream, which he fondly imagined was unselfish and honorable to himself in a high degree. Quite a virtuous glow seemed to mingle with his ardent passion: though the fact simply was (as it often is in such cases) that, for a personal gratification, he was prepared to barter his future prospects. He did not doubt but that what he contemplated would be for the benefit of this young girl: he must seem like an angel to her (for love does not always touch us with the sense of unworthiness); as, indeed, by comparison with this man Coe, he was. His mother would be a good deal "put out," it was certain, at his choice; but for him to be angry with him for long, far less to break with him, he was his own master, for some time to come, at all events, for he had two hundred pounds in his pocket.

What mere boys are the greatest philosophers sometimes discourse, when their subject is Self-interest! It is likely enough that self-interest actuates those of a more mature degree. When folks are by nature wise and prudent—or if their minds are incomplete, and there vices few—or vices, above all, the brain is seasoned, and the blood moves sluggishly in the veins, then men do act for their own advantage, and keep their eyes fixed on the main chance. But with most of us, especially when we are young, however much we so called, is often but a feather's weight in the balance of Motive. Revenge makes it kick the beam; and so does Passion; and even mesmerism. When it was one of the arguments advanced by Christian missionaries of slavery, that no man would ill-use his slave, because it was his own property: as though the fact of cruelty in a brute proprietor was to be looked for, but not in one as strong as the last of gain. There are moments when a man is ready to part with not only his earthly prospects, but his hopes of heaven, rather than be balked of an immediate satisfaction: that of stabbing a brother in the heart, or of hanging rich by one stroke of fraud, or ruining forever the woman that loves him best; and there are many who, in such desperate case, whose only guide is Impulse, and whose care for the consequences of it is nothing matched with the gratification of to-day. These are said to have no enemies but themselves, but they have victims; they "ruin" many, but for plots, are often more dangerous than the most designing knaves.

The light of the window in the bar was as far out over the fire in the deepening twilight, so deep in thought that it quite startled him, when, suddenly opening, the latter's self was there. Then he rang the bell, and Hannah entered with the wood-for candles.

"Is you come to?"

"I'll see, Sir. Do you wish to see him?"

"Yes, I do," said he, with a bottle of sherry and two glasses, then ask him to step in."

The serving-maid obeyed: and presently there was a knock at the door, and Richard, and struck John Trevethick, a man of sixty years or so, but looking as if he had been "put by" much.

"Your servant, Sir," said he, in a gruff voice, and with no such inclination of the head as landlords use.

"Good-evening, Mr. Trevethick. I am afraid I'm putting you to some inconvenience by coming to Gethin so many weeks before the usual time."

"Nay, Sir; my house is open summer and winter."

"Now, I wonder is this the natural manner of this boor," thought Richard, "or has he been already prejudiced against me by the other?—And as nothing honest it is, let him." Aloud he little expected to find so good a one down here, I promise you."

"Well, I built it myself, Sir," said the landlord; "it don't become me to say much of it." He looked at the last bit of money, however, and it's hard to get it back, when one's season only lasts for a month or two."

"Ah! I see," said Richard, with a sweet smile, "and I dare say yours," was the morose reply.

"Indeed it will, and that of many a generation to come. It is seldom one sees such massive walls. A good deal of trouble, however, seems to have been taken to ruin the property from running away with them, to judge by this," and he held up the key.

"Well, the castle is mine, Sir—or, at least, I pay my rent for it; and, I suppose, I can do what I like with my own. If there was no good there, do you think any body would pay me for viewing the place? Not they. Why, there's some parties as even contribute with the key, but must have a guide too, or else they bottoms will hold pocket."

It was so impossible to misunderstand the bearing of this remark that Richard burst out into a good-humored laugh; he was really pleased because the landlord's hint neutered him that he was in ignorance that he had had a guide. "I shall certainly pay my footing, Mr. Trevethick, the sense as if I had had an attendant—of which, however, I should be very glad in one or two places: the wind did take my hat, and very nearly the rest of me. But what I meant by the trouble that was taken to secure your ruins from intruders was with reference not to the door, but to the key of it. Why, if it were a real castle, full of furniture, it could not be more effectually guarded. You must have good locksmiths hereabout, if that's a specimen of their work."

The icy landlord thawed again.

"Well, Sir, the fact is, I made that key with my own hands."

"You?" cried Richard, in affected astonishment. "Why, you must be a mechanical genius. Look at the work! look at the wards! and the scrutcheon there, charmingly close to the candle. "Do take another glass, Mr. Trevethick."

"Nay, Sir; I've a friend in the parlor waiting for me," rejoined the landlord, dryly. He appeared literally to regret having given way to that momentary feeling of self-esteem.

"I wish I had," observed Richard, smiling. "It's long of work coming down by one's self, and finding nobody to speak to."

There was a short pause, during which Richard was rapt in admiration of the key.

"Now, if his thick skin prove impervious to flattery," thought he, "then will I fly my last shaft into his very gizzard."

Mr. Trevethick's skin was quite compliment-proof, if an inference into the parlor was to be the evidence of its having been pierced.

"You should come down in the summer-time, Sir," said he, coldly; "then you will find lots of folks to talk with. At present I am afraid you cannot pay to have your own company."

The huge frame of the landlord was already moving toward the door.

"I am afraid so, indeed," said Richard, carelessly. "Parson Whymper ought to have known better than to send me down here at a time like this."

John Trevethick stopped at once, and Richard saw reflected in the glass above the fire-place a look of interest interest. He could not have supposed so impassive a face was capable of so much expression.

"Parson who, did you say, Sir? Whymper?"

"Yes; an excellent friend of me and mine: the chaplain of Mr. Carew, of Crompton. It was to him told me I should find sketch-book with the beauties of Gethin; and added, that I should have a hearty welcome from one John Trevethick, if I gave his name."

"And that you shall, Sir," cried the landlord, throwing to the table, and striking his broad palm upon it, to give emphasis to his words.

"A friend of Mr. Whymper's should be always welcome here. How is he, Sir? I have his or Mr. Carew's?"

"I have seen neither of them since I was staying at Crompton three months ago or so," said Richard, coolly. "They were well enough then, though Mrs. Squire was ailing at best, as usual, to exhaust his constitution and his purse; and the children, as usual, also, was making things as straight as he could, and playing the said on where he dared. But you know all about them, Mr. Trevethick, I dare say almost as well as I do. I am sorry you won't take another glass of wine."

"I'll not trouble you to offer me to change my maid, Sir," said the other, suiting the action to the word. "Now, the idea of your being so intimate with Parson Whymper, and having staid at Squire Carew's! Why, the Squire's my landlord, Sir, as well as those here—leastways, short of Dunlopped. It's mikucky that this copper-head have cropped out just beyond him, as it were."

"There is no mine here belonging to him then, eh?"

"Well, no, Sir; not, properly speaking, a mine, Sir, at all. And the well-practiced hand of the landlord shook as he said the last two glass, so that it clanked against the bottle.

"Indeed!" replied the young boor—leastways, short of Dunlopped. It's mikucky that this copper-head have cropped out just beyond him, as it were."

"There is no mine here belonging to him then, eh?"

"Well, no, Sir; not, properly speaking, a mine, Sir, at all. And the well-practiced hand of the landlord shook as he said the last two glass, so that it clanked against the bottle.

"Indeed!" replied the young boor, coy laugh, apparently at some reflection of his own.

"Well, I'm sorry you've got your friend, landlord, and your company, for I'm afraid I'm in debt: for it is evident we should find something to talk about together."

"And I'm sorry too, Sir. Though, if you wouldn't be too proud to come into our bar-parlor, I'm sure that I can scarcely ask a gentleman as has been used to Crompton to do that."

"Indeed, I shall be very happy to come," said Richard, frankly. "I have nothing to be proud of, I assure you; and if I had, why should I not accept the company of an honest man?"

Very good, Sir. There's only me, and my friend Harry, and the fine friend of mine, Solomon Coe. If you'll please to walk this way."

"Let's take the bottle with us, and then, perhaps, Mr. Coe will help us to finish it."

And bearing that token of amity in his hand, John Trevethick led the way into the bar parlor.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE BAR PARLOR.

The bar parlor of the Gethin Castle was a small snug apartment in the rear of the house, and rendered necessary to the full fury of the Atlantic winds, which were now roaring without, and unbiased, by their idle menace, the comfort of its cheerful fire and curtains, and its ample fire, the gleam of which was cast back from a goodly array of glasses and vessels of burnished pewter. Upon a well-polished oak chest—the pride of the house, for oak was almost as rare at Gethin as among the Esquimaux—stood a mighty punch-bowl; and on the mantel-piece was a grotesque piece of earthen-ware, used for holding tobacco, about which some long clay pipes and peacocks' feathers were artistically arranged. A small set of mahogany tables provided this apartment, and pleasantly accorded with its almost tropical temperature; and the contrast it altogether afforded to his own more stately but desolate "private sitting-room," with its discordant air and comfortless surroundings, struck Richard very agreeably. On a chintz-covered sofa, in the most retired corner of this parlor, sat Solomon Cox and Harry Trevethick, and it was difficult to say in which of their countenances the most astonishment appeared when the young painter presented himself at the door. Harry's cheeks, which were not pale before, became crimson, though the latter moved not upon his seat. Solomon rose, and, with a frown, seemed to be asking of Trevethick the reason of this unexpected intrusion.

"This is a friend of Mr. Whymper's," said the landlord, setting down the sherry in a tumbler, "and therefore, I am sure, the friend of all of us. That's my daughter Harry, Sir; and that" (and here grimness) "is Solomon Cox, who is intimate friend of hers—as you may see. We are a family party, in fact, or shall be some day: so, pray, make yourself at home."

"I have seen Mr. Coe before," said Richard, frankly, and shaking that gentleman's awful hand; "and, though he took me for a bagman, I bear him no malice on that account."

"A bagman! Lor, Sol, what could you be been thinking about?" laughed Trevethick, grimly.

"Why, his here gentleman had been stopping at Crompton with the Squire! But you mustn't mind Sol, Sir; his mind ain't free just now. Well, Harry, lass, why can't you get up and shake hands with the gen'leman?"

"I have seen this gentleman before also," explained Richard. "It was in who was good enough to get me the key of the castle, which I have put returned, by-the-by, to Mr. Trevethick," he added.

Harry gave him a look which showed him that his second pilgrimage up the rock was not unappreciated.

"Did you see the chapel, Sir, and the tombs?" inquired she.

"I hardly know, indeed," said Richard. "It was the climb itself that I enjoyed the most, and shall never forget as long as I live."

"Oh, but you must go properly over our ruins, young gentleman," said Trevethick, with the air of a proprietor. "My girl here, Harry, will be most done you them to-morrow, for they need a bit of explanation. Sol knows all about them. Don't you, Sol?"

"Oh yes; I know," answered Solomon, doggedly: "but nobody won't go up to the castle to-morrow, I reckon, with this wet weather a-blowing."

"It is a wild night, indeed," said Richard, putting aside the curtain, and looking out through the shutterless window. "The clouds are driving by at a frightful speed."

"Ay, and it ain't only the clouds," said Trevethick, filling his pipe, and speaking in a solemn gravity; "the Flying Dutchman was seen off the point not two hours ago."

"By old Madge, I suppose?" observed Solomon, derisively.

"Yes, by old Madge," retorted the landlord, sturdily. "She as knew our life-boat was lost last year with all hands long before she drove into Tuxtack Bay, bottom upwards."

"But how was that?" inquired Richard, with interest.

"Well, Sir, it was this way," said Trevethick. "It was a stormy night, though not so bad a one as this is like to be, and the life-boat had gone out to a disabled Indiaman. She had been away three hours or more, when—as I was sitting in this very parlor, in came Madge, looking scared enough. She had been to 'Arlock on an errand for us, Sir, 'Sol-town,' as I call it, and was waiting for you look as though the wind had blown your wits away, old woman.' 'Tain't that, John Trevethick,' says she; 'but I'm afeared something to death. I've seen a sight as I shall never forget to my dying day. I have just seen with that men—all nine of 'em. The Lord have mercy on their souls!' 'Well, why not?' says I. 'Why shouldn't you be safe?' 'Safe!' says she, and got back sooner than we hoped for—that's all.' 'Nay,' said she, 'I left my husband and seven children—not from home—the house they will never see again—all wet and white like corpses. They're drowned men, as sure as you're going to die.' 'Come, come,' said I, 'you're not a fool, Madge, John Trevethick.' And so it turned out, poor fellows!"

"And did you tell any body of this before you knew that they were drowned?" inquired Richard, curiously.

"Ay, that's the point," muttered Solomon, approvingly.

"No," said Trevethick. "I didn't believe the old woman, and I thought her story would be very ill taken; so I kept it to myself. But it turned out true for all that; the thing happened just as I say. John Trevethick ain't no liar."

"Of course you are stating what you believe to be the fact," said Richard, in a conciliating tone; "I don't doubt that."

"Just so; he's told it so often that he really does believe it," said Solomon, laughing. "But what seems curious is, that it is always Madge—a purblind old woman, as wants to be put upon a stool to see those things—who sees the sailors, and Flying Dutchmen, and so forth. I should like to know who else has ever seen the Dutchman?"

"Lots of folks," said the landlord, doggedly, "as will be here time enough for you, Sol, I'll be bound." "Ay, and you, too!" And Harry here has been at Gethin all her life, has she seen 'em?

There was an awkward silence. Harry had turned very pale—in terror, as Richard thought, of the quarrel between her father and Solomon becoming serious.

"That's naught to do with it," said Trevethick, sharply. "You're no Gethin man, Solomon, or you wouldn't talk so. Why, didn't Madge describe the very ship as it was off old Castle Rock, the night before we ever set eyes on her? and wasn't it printed in the paper?"

"In the next Saturday's paper: yes," replied Solomon, curtly.

"Nay, I heard the old woman with my own ears," said Harry, gravely. "There had been no wreck when she told me she had seen the schooner. 'The Firefly,' said she, 'is now in quarantine home from Gothin Bay: you mark my words. That was twelve hours, ay, and more, before the wreck."

"Forgive me for interrupting," said Richard, "but I don't understand this matter. Was it supposed that a vessel-a-wanes her own destruction beforehand?"

"Sometimes," said Trevethick, gravely. "A ship is as well known here—if she belongs to this part of the coast—as a house is known in the Midlands. Now, I'll be bound, Madge—and it ain't only Madge neither—will see her days before she comes to her end. The Firefly, for example, belonged to Polwheel, and has been away for weeks."

"And you have expected home?" interrogated Richard.

"Ay, that's it," said Solomon, once more nodding approval. "The old woman had that in her mind."

"Why so?" argued Trevethick. "What was the Firefly to her that she should think she would drive into the bay, and break her heart against the rock out yonder? And why should she tell her vision to Harry?"

"That certainly is very strange, indeed," said Richard, "as showing she attached importance to the matter herself. It was a most delicate consideration, to say the least of it. But what is this Flying Dutchman, of which you also spoke? I shall be glad to know by ever-post as far as I can be proper latitude as this."

"It's seen before great storms, however," said Trevethick: "you ask the coast-guard men, and hear what they say. There's many a craft has put out to her from the land, and come near close, so that a man might almost reach her with a boat-hook, and then, all of a sudden, there is nothing to be seen but the waves."

John Trevethick had more to say to the same effect, to which Richard listened with attentive courtesy; while at the same time he held to the same skeptical view entertained by Solomon. Then he won the good opinion of both men, and of that of the girl he felt already assured. He scarcely ever addressed himself to her, and as much as possible avoided gazing at her. If the idea of his paying any serious attention to her love-lorn lass put into her father's mind, the intelligence that he had been the friend and guest of Caleb's had been probably sufficient to compensate in the social position which that fact implied seemed to make it out of the question that he should be a suitor for her hand. He restrained for him to disabuse Solomon of the same notion. This was at first so easy task; but the unreasonableness of the latter's jealousy and his attempts at conciliation gave way by degrees, and he was vanished. To have hinted at the real reason for his freedom from such weaknesses; and he hailed an ally in a battle-field on which he was recommended at odds, five nights out of every seven, for years. Harry, as we have seen, shared her father's sentiments with regard to Solomon, and was a great stroke of policy in Richard to have exposed the latter's weak side. He would, of course, have preferred to agree with her—to have embraced any view which had the attraction of her adoption; but it was not in his nature to dissemble, and his opposition exciting her to petulance. She was not petulant with Richard—indeed, she seldom had a chance with him after his own fashion.

From the superstitions of the coast they fought their way to those of Cornwall in general. Trevethick believed in "Knockers" and "Buccas," spirits who indicate the position of good lodes by sounds from their hammers, and who have had more immediate connection with his own affairs than the mutual phenomena of which he is accused with even greater tenacity than before. So fierce was their contention that it was with difficulty that Harry could get a word in edge-ways to whence these spirits came who thus interested themselves in the success of their operations.

"I know nothing of that," said Trevethick, frankly, "any more than I know where that wind comes from that is making yonder pane: I only know that it is there."

"Nay, father, but I know," said Harry, with a little blush at her own audition: "the Buccas are the ghosts of the old Jews who crucified our Lord, and were driven by the sight of Roman emperor to work the Cornish mines."

"Very like," said Trevethick, approvingly, although probably without any clear conception of the historical picture thus presented to him. "It's the same to me where they be, so long as having done so much mischief in the flesh."

The contradiction involved in this remarkable process, combined with the absurdity of repentance taking the form of interest in mining speculations, was almost too much for Richard's sense of humor; but he only nodded with gravity, as because a man who was imbibing information from a competent source. Then, in addition to these favorers of industry, there were my spirits who worked ill to miners.

"Well, I can't say as there are," said the landlord, with the air of a man who can afford to give a point in an argument; "but there's a many things not of this world that happen underground, bestway in our mines, for Sol there is from the north, and it mayn't be the same in those parts."

"It certainly is not," interrupted Solomon, taking his pipe out of his mouth to intensify the positiveness of his assertion.

"I say," continued Trevethick, reddening, "that down in Cornwall here there is scarce a mine without its spirit of some sort. At Wheal Vor, for example, a man and his son were blown to pieces while blasting; and, nothing being left of them but fragments of flesh, the engine man put 'em into the furnace with his shovel; and now the pit is full of little black dogs. I've seen one of 'em myself."

Solomon laughed aloud.

Richard was expecting an explosion of wrath. The old man turned toward him quietly, and observed with tender gravity: "And in a certain mine, which I will not here be both acquainted with, a white rabbit always shows itself before any accident which proves fatal to man. It was seen by the day that Sol's father sacrificed his life for mine." Then he told the story which Richard had already heard from Harry's lips, while Solomon looked down, and Harry looked hard at the fire, as though—as Richard thought—to avoid seeing the glance of her father's benefactory benefactor.

"You are right to remember such a noble deed, as long as you live," said Richard, when the old man had done. "My own life," added he, in a softer tone, "was once preserved by one whom I shall love and honor as long as I have breath."

He saw the color glow on the girl's cheek, and the fire-light shine with a new brilliancy in her eye. Harry Trevethick now had no cheek, and the fire-light shine with a new brilliancy in her eye. Harry Trevethick now had no doubt that this observation; at the moment it was made the former was stretching out his hand to the latter, moved by that memory of twenty years ago, and, perhaps, in token of forgiveness for his recent skepticism.

"Then there's the Dead Haud at Wheal Danes, father," observed Harry, in somewhat a constrained voice, "of the present widow. That is curious as any, and more terrible."

"What Dead Hand?" said Richard.

"Why, come then about, when nobody can never have been killed there? It's been missed ever since the Deluge, I thought?"

"Yes, yes; so it has," answered Trevethick, impatiently.

"Well, I thought you told me about it yourself, father?" persisted Harry. "How you saw the thing, with a flame at the finger-ends, creeping up and down where the ladders used to be, and heard voices calling from the pit."

"Not I, indeed," said Trevethick. "That was only what was told me by other folks."—Then aloud: "I spare me sherry between times, Sir; and after that we'd have a bowl of punch."

The hospitalities of Mr. Trevethick's establishment, however, as our manner toward Richard most con-sistency.

"We'll be glad to see you, Sol and I, in our little parlor, whenever you feel in want of company," were his last words at parting for the night, "and, Harry, that's so, but you'll be short rdoresent.

Harry had said nothing: but the tender pressure of h hand, when she wished her good-night, had not gone unreturned, and was an invitation to the parlor sherry between times. Sure enough, the conversation of the evening had given many plenty of matter for reflection; but the power of those soft fingers was more potent, and the dreams evoked by it swallowed up all other thoughts. All night long he was conscious of having to himself a future altogether new to his imagination; and when he came to bed it was to be no more. His excited brain was fed with a nightmare vision. He thought that he was once more with Harry on the castled rock: his eyes were pressed to hers; his arm was around her waist, just as they had been; but, instead of the sipping above the precipice, they fell together; and as they did so—not without a wild delight mingled with his despair—she was suddenly plucked away from him, and, as he sank headlong down, down, he saw that Solomon Cox had caught her in his arms, and, with a fiendish laugh, was looking down upon him with savage and relentless glee!

THE BATTLE OF GRAVELOTTE.

THE most important battle of the war in France, up to the time of writing, was that which took place near the village of Gravelotte, the 18th of August, between the forces under command of Marshal Le Boeuf and the armies of the Crown Royal of Prussia and General STEINMETZ, the result of which was the penning up of the French within the fortifications of that strong-hold. We borrow the following description of the salient points of the battle from the correspondence and graphic account telegraphed to the Tribune, by its special correspondent, who witnessed the struggle at close quarters, and stood by the side of General MOLTKE and King WILLIAM.

The correspondent reached the battle-ground about noon of the 18th, just as the fight was waxing warm. His position was on a hill, whence the entire scene of the Prussian and French forces he could be seen, and a considerable part of their fighting was there, at the time, were the headquarters of the King. The great representative men of Prussia, soldiers and statesmen, were standing on the hill-side watching the combat just begun. Among them were the King, BISMARCK, GENERAL VON MOLTKE, PRINCE FREDERICK CHARLES, PRINCE CARL, PRINCE ADALBERT, and ADJUTANT KRAUSKI. Lieutenant-General SHERIDAN, of the United States army, was also present. At the moment the French were making a most desperate effort to hold on to the last bit of the Verdun road—that between Rezonville and Gravelotte, or that part of Gravelotte which in some maps is called St. Marcel. The struggle was desperate but unavailing, for over on one side the French army had to do battle with, and their line was already beginning to waver. Soon it was plain that this way, the second road, the Metz-Gravelotte road, was closed. This was swiftly taken up under cover of a continuous fire of their artillery from the heights beyond the village. The movement was made in good order, and the position, which was reached at one o'clock and thirty minutes, would have been pronounced impregnable by nine out of ten military men. When once this position had been effected, the French retreating from the pressure of the Prussian artillery fire, and the Prussians rapidly advancing, the battle-field was no longer about Rezonville, but had been transferred to ground behind it. From Rezonville, the junction of the two branching roads to Verdun. The fields in front of that village were literally covered by the two armies masses and intermingle lines of soldiers were steadily marching onward, disappearing into the ravines, and emerging on the other side of it with flaming colors.

This second battle-field was less extensive than the first, and brought the opposing forces into fearfully close quarters. Its importance lay in that it consists of two heights intersected by a deep ravine. This would ravine is over 100 feet deep, and at the top some 300 yards wide. The side of the chasm next to Gravelotte, where the Prussians stood, is much lower than the other side, which gradually ascends to a great height. From their commanding eminence the French had their cannon, and could bring to bear the heaviest upon them scorching fire. The French stood their ground and died—the Prussians stood their ground and died—both by hundreds, I had almost said thousands. This, for an hour or two at least, seemed to be the character of the struggle. The hill where I stood commanded chiefly the further valley and ridge and to the south of it. The Prussian reinforcements, coming up on their right, filed out of the little Ars Ognons: and it was at that point that the battle was to be fought, that one could perhaps get the best idea of the magnitude of which invisible power the hosts of France. There was no break whatever for four hours in the march of men out of that wood. Between WOOD advancing to Jaumann Hill was not a more ominous sight to MACBETH than these men of General LADMIRAULT'S army to HAZEBY, when they emerged at length from the wood they fairly within range and reach of their enemies' cannon. So the Prussians had to wait an hour—four and five o'clock they concentrated upon that spot their heaviest fire, massing all available guns, and shelling the French positions furiously. Then the reached the Prussian lines and tore through them and, though the main struggle was to be a test to which no general cares to subject his troops long. Once out from under the trees the Prussians were met at short range by CANROBERT'S men, and for a time, each army was at the top of the wood, nor of the ground it had won. Then, in a desperate charge, a powerful glass, the brigade was a huge serpent bending with the undulation of the field. But it had a dark rent in its side, for the fire had opened the dark track into falling and dying and dead men. Many of those who had fallen rose again and ran forward a little way, striving still to go on with their comrades. Of those who fell, many died instead of rising. There were few, though many fell as they painfully endeavored to follow their companions.

Now and then the thick cloud which hung over the battle-field would open a little and drift away on the wind, and then the Prussians could be seen, sorely tried. To get a better view of this part of the field, the correspondent went down the hill a little, and, from this new stand-point found himself not far from Malmaison. The French line on the hills was broad and serious, and, to all appearances, they were having the best of the battle. But this appearance was due, perhaps, to the fact that the French army was clearly visible on their broad height, and fighting with such superior efficiency. They failed to succeed a Prussian battery now and then. But the Prussian line also was strengthened by detachments from the northern army. Infantry regiments were brought up; and from far in the rear—way, seemingly, in the direction of Vionville—shot and shell began reaching the French ranks. These were the men and these were the guns of SIEVERS'S corps d'armée and Hessians, directed his junction with the army of PRINCE FREDERICK CHARLES, and completed the investment of METZ to the northwest.

STEINMETZ was able to extend his line gradually further and further to the left. His troops, unflanked and began, to be threatened, as it appeared, with an attack on the rear of their advance right wing. So long as the smoke from the Prussian guns hovered only over their front and left, the battle-field was clear. The Prussians from bend-quarters to where the Prussian flank attack stretched—and this was about two o'clock—to the difficulty of clearly seeing the battle, the darkness was coming on. The puffs of smoke from the Prussian guns were lost in the gloom, brightening as the darkness increased, receded gradually. The pillars of smoke rolled away from the north as gradually and steadily approached. With that advance the French fire every moment grew more and more feeble. It was not five minutes o'clock when the ground was yielded finally on the north, and the last shell burst in that terrible evening were heard in that direction.

So the battle raged, with fluctuating success, until about half-past eight or nine o'clock, precisely when the decisive blow was struck. When the battle of Gravelotte had been fought and won, the Prussians held the strong heights beyond the Bois de Vaux, which command the surrounding country to the limits of artillery range from Metz; that two great Prussian armies lay across the only road by which BAZAINE could march to Paris for its relief, or for his own escape; that a victory greater than that of Sadowa, and more decisive than the triumph of Toulouse, had been won; and that, in all probability, the French army, which had fought so valiantly and so vainly, as before, was now hopelessly shut up in the fortress.

THE BATTLE OF GRAVELOTTE, FOUGHT TH

URSDAY, AUGUST 18, 1870.—[See Page 583.]

THE WEAVER.

A Weaver sat by the side of his loom,
Adjusting his shuttle fast;
And a thread that would wear till the hour of doom
Was added at every cast.

His warp had been by the Angels spun,
And his weft was bright and new,
Like threads which the morning unbraids from the sun,
Jeweled all over with dew.

But something there came slow stealing by,
And a shade on the fabric fell;
And I saw that the shuttle less blithely did fly,
For thought hath a wearisome spell!
But still the Weaver kept weaving, for
Though the fabric all was gray,
And the flowers on the hues and the leaves were gone,
And the gold threads tarnished and dim,

And things all strange were woven in sight
And down-covered the ripen and faint,
And the web was broken and poor and thin,
And it drooped with livelier taint.
And the Weaver fain would have flung it aside,
But he knew it would be a sin;
So he sighed and he glozed the shuttle he plied,
A-weaving the livelong in.

And as he wove, and, weeping, still wove,
A tempter stole him nigh;
And with gilding words he to wile him strove,
But the Weaver turned his eye.
He spoke of a home free to Heaven,
And still wove on, on, on!
Till the last, last cord from his heart was riven,
And the tissue strange was done.

GAMBLING AT HOMBURG.

Entering the tall, stately, painted, and gilded rooms of the Kurhaus, one naturally goes straight to the gambling-rooms, guided thither by the rattle of money, which is audible already through one or two corridors and some distance. You scarcely notice the gay demi-monde toilets, or the curious marks of dress and appearance by which nationality is distinguishable, so anxious are you to watch the play. It is after this first attraction is partly has worn off that you begin to notice other things—first to individuals—the players, and feel an unreasonable desire to convict their guilt, especially to make them withdraw their winnings, when they make any. There is a lady who has won on the red twice, and leaves his undisputed winnings at stake again. Again he wins—there lie eight napoleons in place of the one he invested. Ah, if he would only withdraw it! There it goes into the bank; and you are relieved—disgusted. Next you look for a while at the person playing most heavily, easily guided to him by seeing where the greatest number of croupiers are congregated. Then you have pointed out to you the stock celebrities—the Honorable Mrs. Kendall, Monsieur de M. Blanc, the manager of the gambling-bank, etc., etc. It is probably not till a second or third visit that you find time to admire the large, clean, inlaid floors, the tall paneled and pictured walls, and the distant ceilings with their soothing coolness and gay frescos.

Notice now the lighting of the Kurhaus. Every room is provided with gorgeous brilliant chandeliers, and the whole place is one glitter of glass and gas—entrance-halls, reading-rooms, billiard-rooms, eating and drinking rooms, and gaming-rooms—but not the gaming-tables! Over each of these hang two brightly-lighted and deeply over-shaded oil-lamps. And thereby hangs, also, a tale; as them does by most of the characteristics of this bright-lighted and deeply-shaded, trap-festical institution.

For, once upon a time, when gas alone was used, some enterprising individuals made a combination more effectual, if not more innocent, than the "combinations" of players with the bank, a "system," and try to break the bank by means of calculations—namely, certain rebates to be received the course of the game. Some of the conspirators, having obtained access to the meters or stop-cocks, turned off the gas, by means of which darkness, uproar, and confusion about the tables. The various games of hazard were resolved into one general game of grab, and the company lost many thousands of florins.

Nothing can be more evident than the perfect fairness of the play on the part of the bank. It retains, probably, certain rebates on to its favor. For instance, at the roulette there are thirty-seven squares. If you stake money on either of the two sixes, and the ball runs into that compartment of the wheel, you receive, not thirty-seven times your stake, but thirty-six—the difference being the "percentage" of the bank say one in thirty-seven, or about two and two thirds per cent. It is physically impossible that there should be any deception. The ball rolls in one direction round the interior of the roulette bowl, its centrifugal action sustaining it for a few seconds from descending to the table of thirty-seven divisions which forms the bottom of the bowl. In the mean time this thirty-seven-celled table is set rotating in the opposite direction; and, finally, you can place your stake after the ball and table have been set in motion.

In like manner at the trente-et-quarante table, the cards, six packs together, are shuffled by the croupiers, but they are cut by one of the players, then are dealt into two lines, enough to count some number between thirty-one and forty (the face-cards counting ten each, and the ace according to their number), by the "tailleur," to whose eyes and to whom alone they are dealt them, and not on the stakes which have been made. But even if he saw all the bets, he could not control the series in which the cards are to fall from his hands, nor has he any interest in doing so. And, finally, if he saw the bets, if he had ample opportunity to "stack the cards" before every hand, and if he were to receive all the winnings, it would take more than the abstinence of Methuselahs himself to arrange the play so as to be against the public and in favor of the bank to any greater extent than is expressed in the well-known and undisguised "percentage."

The croupier is not Mephistopheles, no matter how fiendish he may sometimes seem to the luckless loser. He may be a very good sort of fellow, fond of music, father of a family, and all that. In fact, we have heard of one who love lodgings. This is very un-Satanic—if the lodgings are comfortably cool. Some of the croupiers are so human as to introduce a little humor into their otherwise unvarying phrases. There is one who says, "Faites vos jeux, messieurs!" in a pleasant, inviting tenor. Then, suddenly changing, he says, in a sepulchral whisper, "Il jeu est fait—rien ne va plus!" in a profound bass, suited to the decrees of fate. You are prejudiced from your childhood up to changing a piece. "Rouge gagne, couleur perd." You have lost! "Rouge perd." Your neighbor has won! The croupier smiles as well.

There have been croupiers who failed to come up to the standard of perfect neutrality required by Locke, Dymond, and others. But judge if they defrauded the public! One of them played the bank off the leading stuff. (They all take stuff.) But he had also a habit of having the bottom of his snuff-box covered with a silver plate. The box traveled from his pocket to his hand, to him his hand to the table, from the table to his pocket, and so on, as snuff-boxes are apt to travel, and as the exigencies of the game, the hunger of friends, and the pressure of his hands in pushing out and pulling in gold and silver coins might dictate or permit. One day he quietly he imagined, the box, on going into his pocket, had often a gold piece sticking to it, whereas it never previously withdrew when it reappeared to view. From that day to this the company furnishes the snuff for all the croupiers, and in front of each of them is placed a large stationary box filled with it.

Another croupier was a very fat man. He seemed to suffer a good deal with heat, and had a habit of mopping his glowing face, and slapping his fingers against his fat forehead in front his throat. All these phenomena were quite natural, and would have excited no particular except for a peculiar circumstance. Why should the contact or impact of his linen with his skin produce a clinking noise? Why should he not be "handling gold," but it is supposed to be quite a different process from that which could be going on in the career of that croupier, although the sound was similar. To settle this interesting question in a manner "absolutely true," Croupier was invited to step into a private room and disrobe, when he turned out a number of rolls of florins, that slipped in gold piece into his cravat each time he had raised his hand thereto, and, had his real sentiments been known, he might have carried on his very profitable operations to this day. The croupiers now are required to keep their hands always on the table. If one sees much as drops his into his lap, he is at once admonished of his delinquency by a tap on the shoulder from one of the ever-watchful officials in plain clothes always standing about.

What did administrations do with each of these cases, do to their unprofitable servant? They took from what he had unquestionably earned, and then—discharged him! No prosecution, no noise, no disturbance; that is one of the company's rules for the latter. Rules? More especially in the management of the salons de jeu is their motto to allow any thing that makes an exclandre. In fact, the loss resulting from a few moments' interruption of play, at any table in full operation, would be infinitely greater that be sustained from the payment of any demand, however unreasonable. Therefore, as we have just mentioned, the corporation, as the money rolls into its secret receptacles, takes care that there is no room for scandal.

The administration go still further in their deference to good order and public opinion. Should a croupier presume to address another player on some matter, and the croupier decided it against the latter, he would, however he arose in his might, stormed at the idea that such a creature as the poor croupier should presume to dispute his assertions, and threatened that he, the croupier, should be put out of the room. And he was accordingly expelled by the administration!

The poor administration is grievously annoyed sometimes by the outrageous conduct of persons who chooses to kill themselves in the Kursaal, of all places in the world! The latest modality of that kind occurred at Baden. A desperate looser blew out his brains, which spattered themselves over the wall behind! The latter, in a rage even the imperturbability of the gaming-house officials, and they had been disturbed for an hour, however, all evidences of the "occurrence" were removed, and the play going on as if nothing had taken place.

A man worth millions of florins played, and lost everything. He borrowed of all he could procure, and would dash the notes down upon the tables so that they scattered themselves about irregularly. He was accordingly requested to even disquieting to the administration. Once or twice he was expostulated with, and, at length, one of the managers said to him, with their own insinuating politeness, "Dare Sir, you are supposed that you had been playing with your own. You will be more happy elsewhere. Any funds you need you may obtain at the office of the exchange here." The poor fellow cried, "Give me a thousand pounds sterling, and I will go away and never return." Quick, before he could repent or retract, the notes were his. He departed, and so far has kept his word, and staid away.

For the ludicrous side of all this: I have heard of a fellow who played at the roulette table, threw down a coin or two, and then nervously plucked a tuft out of his pocket. Of course one of the watchful guardian proteasted against the irregularity of such conduct. "I must have back my fifty florins!" he cried, still nervously clutching the pistol with trembling fingers. "I beg you to accept twenty-five florins, and leave us." Instantly all was serene. The pistol disappeared—also the man; one of the few who finally leave the Kursaal richer than they came.

A Spaniard, Señor G——, came and played with unusually heavy. The limit of bets at the trente-et-quarante table is four thousand florins on each single bet. G—— played a while, but protested that he could not spend his time over such beggarly stakes, and demanded the privilege of doubling the amount, otherwise he should go elsewhere. The concession was at once accorded him. Before he departed, he "broke the bank" at each of the four tables in the Homburg establishment. He then went to Baden, it is said, and broke the bank there. His aggregate winnings were estimated to have been a million of francs. Incarceration in a Parisian prison for petty theft was a subsequent incident in the career of this winning gonn, his exploit gone, then his character, and finally his liberty departed—he has now leisure for reflection. Who can say that his own men have been ruined by the tradition of G——'s doings—men who thought they could follow his road to the top of the hill, and then leave it without making the descent?

Please observe here that a man may "break the bank," and yet be at the same moment a loser in the transaction. The phrase does not mean that the unknown and incalculable reserve-hoards of the association are exhausted, or even that they are withdrawn, except to the extent of the capital placed by the administration at the disposal of the banker any particular table on any particular day. In the entrance hall is posted a written placard, as follows:

Max. Bank
Au Trente-et-un, 19,000 fr.
A la Roulette, 40,000 fr.
Administration.

So it will be seen that whenever, on any day, the losses of the bank table exceed the gains by the sum of 60,000 francs, technically speaking, the bank is broken at that table: the croupiers cease to play, the cloth is spread, and, so, we may be sure, is the news. "The bank was broken at the roulette table!" Fancy the thrill that would run through the idle crowds in the hotels and pensions of Homburg! "Who broke it? Was it Mr. Smith?" "Was it Lord Low and copy his play to-morrow?" "No; it will play that system of his play? Such luck can not last!" And so on, in polyglot. Confancies that it must pay the bank very well to be thus interrupted, and, at the very same time, the "lucky man" may have lost at that same table yesterday twice the sum he gained in breaking the bank to-day.

A famous player and constant loser was the Countess Hatzfeldt, by all accounts often described. Every one has heard of her being wheeled in her chair to the Kursaal, and sitting at her place at the table throughout the evening in close of the play, almost uninterruptedly, seven days each week, during the season. Every one knows how she lost regarding her age; but, from her looks, she can not be over seventy. Besides, her pecuniary losses, the late Emperor Nicholas of Russia fix the date of her birth as being almost eventually near the beginning of the present century. Very large, very best, very infirm, very bright-eyed, and very affable—such are the characteristics which mark the appearance of this once world-famous beauty. Nicholas left her annuity of 100,000 francs a year. The present Emperor cut down this pension one half, and on the remainder the Countess manages to live, apparently, to live. Of course she can not play very heavily. She is said to set aside forty thousand francs a year to lose at play, saying, that, in that sum and sphere, she spent more than that sum on dress and gayety—and, now that beauty and gayety are gone, she must spend her time and money on the pleasures which are left her. Gaming, with her, is the only pleasure left, an occupation—a night excitement, almost unaccustomed with hope and fear. Her losses are, therefore, to her, gains. She is much respected. When she is in St. Petersburg the street where she lives is blocked with carriages—the rubber—the best society then says.

The first charter of the Privilegirte Bank was given in 1842, and expired in 1866, at which time the second (also for twenty-four years) was granted, because the war in Germany in 1866, and, as one of the consequences thereof, House Rothschild refused to renew the charter. Its sun laves forbid public gambling; so there is talk of closing the gambling-rooms next year. What will become of the thousands who find it done? Kurhaus means the house where people are cured, and it is to be supposed that the business waters of the springs will lose their medicinal virtues in consequence of having become gambling-hells. The "Bad-Homburg" still, as long as the baths remain, though not with the double significance the word has now with the "Bad-Homburg" gambling-hell in the world. The Kur-gardens will be lovely, green, shady walks. The Kurhaus will stand as now with its ponds. The Kurhaus will still exist in all its gorgeous splendor. And in the Kurhaus the police will be most ordered for many a year, beautiful rooms wherein time and neglect can only damages the glories of color, not the perfections of form and proportion. Who will come to be cured when there remain to be administered only nature's remedies for bodily ills? We all know that the main attraction has been the fascination—the excitement of the gaming-table. A good for plethora of the pocket. It is money left here by the fortune-seekers that has built up this lovely little city for us simple health and pleasure seekers—laid out and paved these model streets, smoothed, planted, and beautified the pleasure-grounds that surround the wells, formed the lovely outdoor flower-beds and tropical green-houses, provided the concerts daily given to the public, and the frequent balls to which all visitors are freely invited. All this, besides paying for the magnificent Kurhaus, and giving the shareholders dividends of fifty, seventy-five, and a hundred per cent. per annum! Yes, Homburg is a beautiful place, and the Privilegirte Bank has done every thing for Homburg.

A SOUL'S PARTING.

On a fine September evening in the south of France, when the purple glow of the western sky lighted up the purple of the vine hills, the town of Tarbes was excited. A bad railway accident had happened near to it, and the injured passengers were being taken, some in carriages and some on stretchers (according to the gravity of the hurts received), to the hams they had received), from the station up into the town. With all the impressive warmth of the Basque population in general, the citizens crowded round the slow procession; the women with tears in their large dark eyes which seem the birth-right of the daughters of the Pyrenees, the men eagerly extending their strong arms to help to carry the wounded. Among the sufferers was a young man, who lay pale and motionless upon a stretcher. In him the good people of Tarbes took especial interest, partly because he was good-looking and apparently much hurt, partly because a fellow-feeling linked him, who was another hero-self much bruised and shaken, but who, notwithstanding the accident, managed to walk unaided home, and even of a medical man who was hurrying about among the patients, that she should have her companion and get out of the carriages, still kept close to him and tried to support his head upon her arm. She was young, also good-looking; and the language in which she now and then spoke words of compassion or encouragement to the unconscious man as she bent over him, as well as the golden shade of her light brown hair, told that she was a Monsieur, the wreath of orange flowers on her bonnet announced her as a bride. Some would have inferred from some truth from this, which, even in the midst of her distress and preoccupation, now and then rose to the young lady's lips, that she noticed that her bridegroom for the injured man was commented upon in the crowd.

In fact, Clara—her name was Clara—had not been the wife of Mr. Charles Temple for more than a week. Mr. Charles Temple was a young man who had achieved the rare distinction of getting every thing himself with British pluck for a volume of poems. In his quality of poet Mr. Charles Temple had during his courtship of Miss Clara Vernon eloquently, with her the goddess, she on her side, after the fashion of womankind, had turned away from the poet; then, having gradually bent down toward him, and finally insisted upon descending from her pedestal, and declared herself turning the worshiper.

Mr. Temple, the wounded, was at once conveyed to the hospital, where he remained for a week in a state of unconsciousness of the brain. This was a cruel trial for the week-old wife; but after the first shock was over she buckled to her duty. "It's a girl who, though she will run squeaking from a mouse, can fight with lions," said the old commander of the Queen's garrison at Gibraltar, and had much to do with her education. The fine old Indian house had now more than one, and Clara was facing him gallantly. Notwithstanding her own bruises and shakes, she had at once established herself at her patient's bedside, refusing to give up his place, even for a moment, to the attendants of Charity. For several days and nights, during which her husband first lay in the bottom of a deep well of unconsciousness and then came out of it only to wander through a dark grove of delirium, the young wife watched incessantly beside him, the nursing nurses of Tarbes by her quiet courage and her patient helpfulness. As the days went by, she had left behind her her childhood was a confirmed invalid, she was not used to a sick-room. The religious faith which was a part of the life of her English home shone forth like a charmed writing when held before the fire to the fire of adversity. Doctor Bernardine, the physician who attended Charles, was a kindly family man, and, touched by the sweet motherliness of the young bride, soon grew to trust her much as he would have trusted his own daughters under the like circumstances. At length Temple regained consciousness, and the doctor had hope of him. But there was a fearful thing of her lover's face. The shock she had herself received in the railway accident, which, however, did not show any damage in her; but the doctor's practiced eye detected that it had produced at his heart for her, deranged his entrenties, and the stars of love and hope still shone calmly on in her eyes beside her husband's bed, but they were burning, however, with a fever. Charles, to his surprise, found a Sister of Charity sitting beside him, and Doctor Bernardine, when he came, was forced to reply to his eager questioning that Clara had knocked herself up with overfatigue. Days passed by; the young husband very slowly improved, but the young wife did not return to his bedside. His distress and anxiety about her knew no bounds, and were so great as to retard his own recovery. Every day he entreated the doctor with questions, and every day he received from him evasive and soothing replies, which the man's heart but too plainly felt were veils which the physician, in compassionate care for his health, strove to draw between him and the truth. The truth was, that there was very small hope of her life. Throughout her illness she remained gentle and brave. Her chief anxiety was still for her husband: her chief regret when her own death seemed near was caused by the foreseeing of his grief. No doubt deep down in her heart there were fervent wishes and prayers that she might live only a little longer still; but these were for no human ear. At length, one evening Charles was aroused from dozing by a noise in his room. On opening round he found a man, who had come from Sœur Thérèse, who was weeping violently. Then the truth at once flashed on him that Lucie was dead. Yes; why hide it from him? Her spirit, while he slept unconscious of his loss, had died away like a sweet strain of music.

The night was far advanced when Charles Temple awoke from a most unusual sleep which, notwithstanding his passion of grief, or rather because of it, physical weakness made him fall. He had been dreaming that he had encountered in his poetry wife in the deep Devonshire lane where first he vowed her. He thought he had given her a white rose from his breast. She took it; but as she was about to place it in her dress a drop of blood from her heart stained with upon the snowy petals; at which he started and awoke, with that sort of vague nervousness of a man who not unusually haunts even healthy people for a few minutes after awaking from a disturbed dream. Not knowing what he had expected to see, he glanced timidly around. Sœur Thérèse had left the room, as it was her custom to do when her patient slept: and he could distinguish the sound of her regular, heavy breathing as she slumbered in the guest apartment. Close candle which stood on a distant table flickered fitfully, as though fanned by an invisible wheel fluttering somewhere in the air. In its waving, dying light dark shadows crept about in the corners of the room. Then he thought of dead Sisters of Charity who had returned to visit the scene of their labors during life. Outside the wind rose and fell in long measured sighs; and a few rain-drops, which came down at intervals, pattered against the window like fingers of unseeing ghosts who were there tapping for admission. A strange, sad fancy now seized Charles—a fancy which, considering the mental state of the young poet's mind, the delirium from which he brain had so lately recovered, and the body

"DEAD MEN'S CLOTHES SOON WEAR OUT."

GROUSE SHOOTING.

THE Twelfth of August is a day looked forward to by the "grown boys" of Great Britain with as much interest as juveniles among us regard the approach of the Glorious Fourth.

Many an important piece of legislation is hurried through the imperial Parliament to admit of an adjournment in time to allow the hereditary rulers of the country to reach the northern moors on the day when the slaughter of grouse is by law permitted to commence.

The preservation of game birds has been reduced to a science by the thrifty Scots: and many a puir-laird is indebted to the value of the "shooting" on his otherwise worthless property for his winter supply of oat-meal and whisky.

All the moorland of Scotland is carefully preserved, and, although the yearly slaughter of birds is very large, the supply appears to keep pace with the demand.

Early in the season, before the birds have "packed" over good ground, the sport is not more fatiguing than any other kind of shooting; but later, when the young birds have attained their full strength of flight, it requires a keen eye to mark the dis aut point of descent of a pack from which the hunter may have picked a brace on their first rise.

The whir-r-r of a grouse, as it darts from its lair amidst the thick heather, is music to the ear of a practiced gunner, but sadly discomposing to the nerves of a novice. Even southern pointers, well trained to the ware, ware of the English partridge, wink their eyes and shake their heads on hearing the noise accompanying the flight of the grouse.

GROUSE SHOOTING IN SCOTLAND.

THE COLOR OF SEA AND SKY.

SMOKERS have all noticed that the smoke from the end of a pipe or cigar is bluer than that which they puff from the mouth, and many may have wondered what the reason of this could be. The contrast may be well seen on a bright sunny day. This is, in fact, the simplest form of the experiment of the condensation of vapors causing them to pass through a fine blue to a white condition, which Professor Tyndall exhibited about two years ago, and which he employed to explain the blue color of the sky and the remarkable polarization of its light. The finer state of division in the freshly formed smoke gives it its bright blue color, as does the finely divided aqueous vapor give to the blue sky: the smoke which has passed through the pipe-stem and mouth has become more condensed, and consequently gives a whiter cloud.

The color of water is, it appears, to a great degree dependent on the same cause as that of the sky. M. Soret, of Geneva, soon after Professor Tyndall's researches on the cause of the bluish blueness of the sky were published, made similar researches on the waters of the Lake of Geneva, and found that the light from the water, when blue, was polarized as the light from the sky, and, so far, there was the probability of the cause of the color being similar in the two cases. That particles in a fine state of division are the cause of the blueness of water as well as of sky is also made evident from a comparison of the waters of different lakes, seas, and rivers. The most popular theories as to the cause of the color of masses of water, which have very deep rest, and yet must, it seems, be abandoned. One is that seas or lakes are blue by reflecting the blue sky. The second popular theory which seems to be founded is that the green color of lakes, rivers, and seas is due to plants growing on the bottoms and giving their color by reflection. The green color is produced in the same way as the blue in all probability, and may be due to a similar cause, but it is less easily accounted for than the blue color. M. Saintier Claire Deville is quoted by M. Soret as stating that waters which give a vibration upon examination are blue, while those which give a vibration resistance are green. Reflection of the color of the sky, and of the plant-color from the bottom, does no doubt produce color of water in some cases, but it is only in shallow pools that the latter can have any effect, or through perfectly smooth surfaces that the former can be effective.

Some cases of water-coloration which observers have been unable to find out of sight of land. Intensely blue on a bright day, with pale sky and large cumulus clouds, was the color of water in reservoirs two miles and one fifth in length, receiving chalk (by means of which the water is softened according to a patent process). 2. Intensely blue—the Mediterranean at Marseilles. 3. Bright blue—Lake of Geneva. 4. Darker blue, tending to green—an near Geneva. 5. Also the Lasober See, in the Eifel. 6. Pale blue—see near chalk cliffs, being at a little distance from the coast green or grayish. 6. Pale blue or grayish blue—the Rhone, the Moselle, glacier streams, etc. 7. Green—the Rhine, the Meuse (very markedly so at Antwerp, as testified in Belgian pictures), the Seine, Thames, Tiber, etc. 8. Intense green—in patches on the Lake of Geneva; in the evening, when the sun was just below the mountains, more intensely on the Lakes of Thun and Lucerne. 9. Bright green—as seen on a windy day, with the sun, off the Isle of Man. 10. The sea round the coral reefs of Florida is said to be intensely green; when seen over the coast it is dirty green. 11. On a heavy, clouded day, with rain, gleams of sunshine out at sea give patches of green, blue, and reddish-brown. 12. Water standing in an old copper mine at Killarney was intensely green, while the water in the lake at the side of the mine in the mass. 13. Red color is produced in some seas by algæ, in others and in some rivers by the breaking up of soil colored red by iron. 14. Opaque green color is produced in ponds by unicellular organisms, which sometimes appear in these waters. They may similarly become red. Perhaps the most remarkable instance of blue color, due to the optical properties of water, is the blue grotto of Capreæ, where, at any rate, the reflection of the sky is diminished. 15. Water phenomenon is the glorious blue and green of the glacier fissures.

Leaving the question of surface reflection aside, which can only come into play in the case of wide pools and still lakes and tideless waters, and also leaving aside the appearance of vegetation in clear shallow streams and pools, it seems that at present time we may ascribe the blue color of masses of water to a peculiar reflection of the light from within the water, accompanied with polarization, and depending on suspended particles. Blackish, brownish, and yellow color is due to vegetable matter in solution; reddish-brown to iron, sometimes; green, sometimes; milky-green or algæ; but the latter commonly seen on seas, lakes, and rivers, like that of glacier fissures, probable admits of a similar explanation to that of the blue.

COUNT GASPARIN ON THE WAR.

WE give below a vigorous protest, from the pen of Count GASPARIN, against the war which the ambition of NAPOLEON has forced upon France. The letter was originally addressed to the editor of the Journal des Debats, under date of July 14, and has been translated expressly for Harper's Weekly.

Mr. Editor:

Every man should have the courage to express his opinion. In a moment like this the duty of speaking, of speaking openly and explicitly, extends even to those who, like me, have long since become strangers to politics. If, from the depths of my retirement, I raise a voice which at least has the merit of being sincere and impartial, it is because I believe me that is being silent I should be guilty of real cowardice. I love my country too well, and I also love justice too well, not to protest against the profound insanity of the warlike passions which are about to carry us away.

But no, these passions are by no means unanimous. There are in France, I know, a very considerable number of citizens who believe neither in the necessity nor in the holiness of the war against Prussia. They believe still more ardently in the struggle, as they say, in the papers; but they have gone, they have left it, they have voted for it, and they are somewhat astonished that this has already been forgotten by their representatives. Those citizens will not see a war begun which nothing justifies in their sight—they will not witness a conflict which wounds their conscience, and perhaps threatens the future of a whole generation—they will not entrust to the anarchy in store for fathers of families, to any outflow of the indefinite increase of our conscriptions, our debts, and our taxes, without yielding more and more to a feeling which we yet hardly more than instinct, but which will soon ripen into energetic conviction and obstinate resistance. I think that it will be well to pay some consideration to these men, not noisy in general, and slow to make up their minds, but who, nevertheless, will be found to hold the balance of power in the end. Now, this is the conclusion arrived at by their good sense, and above all, their conscience.

In the first place (and herein lies the whole question), they have never thought that France had to seek revenge for Sadowa. They have been ignorant up to this time that France was conquered in Sadowa with Austria, or that the Prussians failed in their duty in not having marched on Vienna. They have too high an opinion of French honor to believe it compatible therewith, because or other has taken it upon himself to win a great battle in Europe, and they have let his ego an idea of the power of which we believe it to be, that because Germany has organized itself into a nation. The old theories of the balance of power resting on the division and weakness of nations do not seem to them to have had their day, and they would rejoice to see at least a single step of advance made for such theories.

When the declaration of war of the Duke of Gramont broke forth like a thunder-clap in a cloudless sky, these citizens thought that it would be useful to receive some mortal insult, but the country was in peril, and that we had some responsibilities to Europe through those diplomatic measures which a government usually could better master. Instead of defiance and giving the signal for kindling the national and military sympathies, we startle ourselves among us. Then they perceived, to their extreme surprise, on one side, that the cabinets had been informed of the secret and amicable remonstrances, and that we had been at the end, on the contrary, of the candid confidence of the Prince of Hohenzollern—more a Minister than a Prussian—and could not be ignorant that, as Jean Jacques had spoken of it, several months before, in the Journal des Debats, and the German journals had confirmed it, the candidature was withdrawn.

Still more, this candidature was withdrawn; whereupon the citizens of whom I am speaking said to themselves that, unless we were determined on war, and were seeking a pretext, we shall not make it. The withdrawal from the candidature, announced by the letter of the Prince of Hohenzollern, was conducted to our government by the Spanish Minister.

And, therefore, what was the surprise—and this word falls short of the meaning—of the sincere friends of peace to learn that nothing was considered! Twelve pursuits, interpolate in their language and crude in their report of affairs, told us that the Emperor would impose on Prussia not a renunciation, but a humiliation; that is to say, to insist upon what at once cost took the place of what had formerly been called peace or war pacific.

What was the Ring of Prusia to do? He had just declared to our ambassador that he had opposed the candidature of the Prince of Hohenzollern, and that he approved of his withdrawal. On seeing that something more was demanded of him, it was natural that he should call to mind that communication to the Corps Législatif, hearing that the question of war originated with which our Minister of Foreign Affairs had begun without the slightest negotiation.

The French citizens who have no revenge to take for Sadowa may imagine that the King did not see fit to report once more to M. Benedetti that he had opposed a nomination [candidature] which, after all, he had been certified by Spain. But as to finding in the refusal to say this again a cause or even a pretext for war—as to thinking that this authorized us to inundate Europe with blood—they are very far from it, I assure you.

The communication of M. OLLIVIER has filled them with consternation and with real despair. Between these petty details of etiquette and that terrible conclusion, we declared, the Emperor could perceive to them so great that their conscience protested as loudly as their reason against it. They are terrified at the frightful responsibility which it is sought to cast upon their country.

M. BENEDETTI has addressed a note to the foreign powers concerning what has taken place. Well, in this strange affair the declaration of M. DE GRAMONT to Germany is making preparations—we have proof—for making them also, and which are further advanced ?

I repeat, what most alarms the friends of peace among us is to see to what extent they were precluded on our side is lacking. Observe that these friends of peace are at the same time friends of revenge. Now they can not but remember that in France a great war and liberty rarely go hand in hand.

A great war! this scarcely expresses all. What shock-key over the whole of Europe! What upheaval in question ? It is not two armies, but two nationalities, almost two races, that are about coming to grips! Suppose even a Jena; nothing will be concluded: Napoleon was master in 1806 and 1807, for whose unity we shall have done more than Bismarck—Germany will remain in her dismemberment. To use the men of Jena, indeed, who roused all Europe against us, who occupied Paris in 1814, and decided the fate of Waterloo in 1815.

Such are the thoughts which every day become clearer among our fellow-citizens, the friends of peace. No victory, no increase of territory, will suffice to them the inconsolable grief of seeing violence done to justice in the name of their country.

And their number will go on increasing. Should the war be prolonged, when our agricultural classes are attacked, when we have irretrievably cut into the road which leads to the last man and the last dollar, then it will be perceived if it entered into its wake war when it is not indispensable, it is imprudent to slumber for the will of a people as authentically provoked by a Minister, the clamor of the mob, the momentary excitements of the masses for the flag, and, in fine, the ardor of the enemies of parliamentary liberty, who avail themselves of a war to recover lost ground.

I utter these words without hesitation. Let them compromise me as they will. I shall not shield myself behind duty, and pretested, as far as in me lies, against an act which is to destroy the work of centuries.

Will it be said that in doing this I am wanting in patriotism? Is it not the most patriotic duty to denounce very patriotic when they condemned, in Parliament, the war against France? Are we apt to be hurried on by the loud resounding phrase, "The flag of our country is insulted, and we must follow it!" That is to say, we must no longer speak or reflect at all. Never was maxim of despotism better conceived. A declaration of war is hurried on in the midst of alarm! and then silence opinion! Silence in the court! The day is ruined!

But if the flag is unfurled, is to our conscience; and we will not, and can not, accept the burden of moral responsibility in a butchery which nothing renders lawful in our sight.

There are, it appears, two kinds of patriotism; that which follows the flag wherever it goes, wore it that of LAFAYETTE on the way to re-establish slavery at San Domingo, and that which struggles at its own risk and peril against every thing which seems to it to compromise the country's honor. For this kind of patriotism, the country's honor, the sin is not to win numerous battles, but to commit a crime against the representative and patron of all generous causes. This patriotism also has its martyrs, as you see, and does not aspire to a mediocre place for the country.

Will it be objected that the protests of the friends of justice and peace come too late? In any case, this is not their fault. Our government has on no abrupt manner, and its conclusion hurried on so rudely in the first act, that we are quite excusable for not coming in time.

But is it quite true that we are not in time? It would be a mistake to the men who govern us to suppose that at the moment of firing the first gun—at the moment of setting in play all the ingenious machinery for killing that has been invented—they will not feel some interrable hesitation. When the hour shall strike for beginning, indeed, what may have inscrutable resolutions in the Emperor, who knows whether the timely pacific intervention of impartial countries such as Switzerland has not yet succeed in preventing the fatal encounter? Who knows whether, even later, the re-establishment of peace may not be rendered more possible and easy by the mere fact that there are declared adversaries of the war in France?

In any case, it was necessary that this should be said. For wounded consciences there is but one means of healing—to speak.

Many others think like myself; but were I alone I should believe I owe it to my country to manifest the protest and signing it.

A. DE GASPARIN,
Ex-Deputy.

P.S.—Historians who may wish to explain why King WILLIAM will not grant one more hearing to our Ambassador will not do ill, perhaps, to remember that M. DE GRAMONT, on being interrogated in the Corps Législatif as to whether the demand concerning the Hohenzollern candidature was the only one presented by us to Prussia, refused to answer. This refusal, coupled with the first communication made by M. DE GRAMONT to the tribune, and a significance which must have been found out by Count BISMARCK at Paris, M. EMILE OLLIVIER alone seems not to have comprehended it.

I wish to say, for the benefit of those who do not know me, that no one has blamed more harshly than myself the conduct of the Duke of BROGLIE in 1866; but the fruits of BISMARCK in 1866 have absolutely nothing to do with this, which is the sole or daylight—open—indictment in 1870 makes war because it wishes to do so.

LADY FAIR.

UNDERNEATH the beech-tree sitting,
With that everlasting knitting,
And the soft sun-shadows flitting
Through your wavy hair,
All my thoughts and plans confusing,
All my resolution loosing,
Say, what matter's in your musing,
Lady fair?

Oh, the charm that in your face is!
All the loves and all the graces!
To be chain'd in such a prison
Monarch's guardon were:
Not a man, I were, who sees you
But would give his life to please you,
Yet you ask—that lovers tease you!
Lady fair!

One by one, to their undoing,
Fools in plenty come a-wooing,
Baffled still, and still pursuing,
Tangled in the snare:
In your ever-changing smile hid,
To beneath your sleepy eyelid,
Many a heart it hath beguiled,
Lady fair.

While the summer breezes fan her
Gently with their leafy banner,
Venus' love and Flora's manner,
Doth my goddess wear:
Lives the man who can discover
Any secret you'll not hover
To the wish of mortal lover,
Cold as fair?

But to see those dark eyes brighten,
And for me with kindness lighten,
While the glowing rich colors heighten,
What would I not dare?
To inform their scornful splendor
With the twilight soft and tender,
Bow the proud heart to surrender,
Lady fair!

By the lives that thou hast broken,
By the words that I have spoken,
By the passion they betoken,
I have loved, I swear,
Only thee since I have seen thee:
And, if woman's heart be in thee,
I will die, but I will win thee,
Lady fair!

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I HAVE said my Wheeler & Wilson Machine for more than fourteen years, without a cent's worth of repairs, and I would not give it for a new one to-day. It looks rather the worse for wear, but works like a charm. I used one needle for five years, until it was worn too short for any further use. I have made one thousand overcoat shirts, and stitched fifty-six dozen collars, four-ply, each day for four years.—MRS. MARY E. KINGSBURY, Green Island, Albany Co., N. Y.

INTERESTING TO LADIES.

"ONE Grover & Baker Machine has had constant service for the past eight years, during which time, as a family sewer, we have neither seen nor heard of its equal for simplicity in construction and neatness, with great durability of stitch. "Witching," as applied to other machines by our neighbors, is with us unknown."—H. F. WARREN, Scranton, Pa.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most timid wonderer ever known in the annals of journalism, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper ever issued. As an illustrated chronicler of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. By a special arrangement, involving great expense, with the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal hitherto in Europe—its fashion-plates are published fifteen days in advance of those of any publication in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter.—Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every topic of social interest. No effort and no expense will be spared to permanently secure for this journal the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

Cut paper Patterns of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in the paper, graded to fit any figure from 32 to 46 inches bust measure, and from 3 to 15 years of age, and to suit any size of girl or child, or separate pieces of the dress, will be sent by the Publishers prepaid by mail on receipt of Twenty-five Cents and bust measure. The same patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. Dressmakers supplied with the entire set of nine sizes at $2 00. Newsdealers supplied at the usual discount. In ordering, please specify the number of the paper containing suit and bust measure.

In the BAZAR for April 16 was commenced "The Greybrothers," a serial story of thrilling interest, by "Ouida," author of "Held in Bondage," "Strathmore," &c., profusely illustrated.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the day. Its articles on topics of the time are fair, practical and local interest. The best artists in the country are employed to sketch for the department of Illustrations, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographers for many of the fine pictures of Scenery, and of Portraits of persons and events, which illustrate the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. The success which has attended this publication has been unprecedented, and it has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a leading position.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY constitutes one of its most prominent features. It includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Manufactures, topics.

Harper's Magazine.

The June Number began the Forty-first Vol. of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. Its success hitherto—unrivaled by any Magazine ever published in the United States—has been due to the popular character and variety of its contents, to the enterprise which it has shown in securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions of the day, and to the liberality with which its profusely-illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration, Fiction, Biographies, Literature, and General treatment of its papers upon scientific subjects, upon the most important events of the day, and upon the various topics of the time have embraced in their range.

The Editorial and Miscellaneous departments of the Magazine are also a prominent feature, and the Monthly Record, The Editor's Easy Chair, The Literary Record, The Editor's Drawer, and The Editor's Table are each the favorite resort of its several Editorial Departments—to which recently a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record. The elements upon which the past success of the MAGAZINE is based are unlimited as to the time of its leading characteristics; and its Publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of the reading public they will be able to enhance even its present popularity.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred more pages of reading matter than any other periodical issued in the English language. Thus the single space of a month, which is allotted to it, affords a range for the treatment of all the topics embraced in their plan.

MACGREGOR'S
Rob Roy on the Jordan.
The Rob Roy on the Jordan, Nile, Red Sea, and Gennesareth, &c. A Canoe Cruise in Palestine and Egypt, and the Waters of Damascus. By J. MACGREGOR, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

The "Rob Roy" is a canoe in which Mr. Macgregor had paddled his way over the lakes and rivers of many lands, and in which, a few months ago, he journeyed through the Suez Canal and followed the course of the Jordan by reason of the light draught of his little vessel penetrating to spots hereafter to be famous in Scripture history. He describes the trip delightfully in readable and natural letters to adventures in a style that does not often weary.—N. Y. Evening Post.
The trip on the Jordan, from its sources to its mouth, is especially full of interest and value to the Christian reader. The work will supplement our knowledge of the lands visited in many important particulars, and will convey an idea of the waters of Palestine with more minute distinctness than any previously published. It abounds in valuable scientific information, and is enriched with maps and numerous fine illustrations.—Sunday-School Times.
It always delightful to read a story-teller, and actually having made such a book is worth narrating, he has really accomplished not a little in this interesting volume to our further acquaintance with several localities in Syria.—Athenæum.
Mr. Macgregor finds a more entertaining book than this. The original and eccentric mode of traveling adopted by the author, his humorous and often ridiculous adventures, and the pleasant, racy style in which he writes, impart to these pages a veritable air of romance.—N. Y. Herald.
Exceedingly entertaining.—N. Y. Times.

PICTORIAL MAP

Of the Seat of War in France, on which the movements of the several armies can be easily traced, and which shows the country of Paris with reference to the investing forces, and its railroad connection with other cities.

NAPOLEON'S OVERTHROW.

ON the fifteenth of last July the French Emperor, yielding to obvious pretext, declared war against Prussia. The news awakened the wildest enthusiasm throughout France. The nation appeared to be crazy for war. With hardly any aggerated ideas of their own military strength, and fatally underrating that of Prussia, they looked forward to a short, sharp, and decisive campaign on German soil, and to a peace, dictated at Berlin, which should make the Rhine the eastern boundary of the empire. Officers and private soldiers, leaving Paris for the frontier, ordered that after the fifteenth of August their letters should be directed to Berlin; and Minister Ollivier, in the French Senate, announced that he accepted the war "with a light heart!"

Not so did Germany make answer. "God is my witness," said King William to the crowd assembled to witness his departure from Ems, "that I have not desired war; but if I am forced into it, I will maintain the honor of Germany to the last man." His people responded to these words with a solemn and earnest enthusiasm, to which a parallel can only be found in the great uprising of the North after the firing on Sumter. Minor differences and petty jealousies were forgotten. Party distinction rose, like a strong man from sleep; and, before the vacillating Emperor was prepared to strike a single blow, a million of soldiers stood grand upon the Rhine. We need not recount the marvelous campaign that followed, unparalleled in the history of the world. In less than fifty days after the declaration of war —and less than forty of actual fighting—the Imperial army of France suffered humiliation in a dozen defeats; the empire was overrun with German soldiery; the capital is threatened, and in a state of siege; one great army is penned in a long series of terrible battles, is shut up helpless within the fortifications of Metz; nineteen generals, a hundred thousand men —the largest number that ever capitulated at one time—has been surrendered by its commander; the Prince Imperial and the Emperor are prisoners! Well may the victorious King exclaim, in his modest dispatch to the Queen: "What a change, under the guidance of God, events have taken!"

It were useless, when great events tread so rapidly on each other's heels, to speculate on the probable results of this crowning victory of the Prussian arms, or to discuss the causes of the French defeat. There seems to be no doubt that NAPOLEON was the victim of great frauds and deception from the first. His immense armies existed only on paper. The military condition of the empire was thoroughly rotten. Had the Emperor been earlier aware of these facts he would not have ventured upon the war; but, unfortunately for him, he first became aware of them after war had been declared. He, then, as is well known, endeavored to open negotiations with Prussia, but COUNT VON BISMARCK sternly replied it was "too late." Nothing, then, to take the initiative, NAPOLEON found himself scarcely prepared to stand on the defensive, and the terrible blow that crushed MCMAHON'S army at SEDAN came virtually decided the struggle. Yet the soldiery of France never fought more gallantly than at Wissembourg, Forbach, and Metz. They could have incurred no disgrace in these terrible defeats. They have succumbed to vastly preponderating numbers, aided by bad generalship on the part of their own commanders in the first weeks of the war.

If all this shall bring peace to Europe and a stable government to France, founded really on the will of the nation and not its fraud, the world will have good reason to rejoice over the result of this wonderful campaign. The good will be dearly bought, it is true. The sacrifice of life has been enormous, and probably the German armies have suffered far greater losses in killed and wounded than the French. The most fertile part of France has been laid in bad waste and desolate that years must elapse before the injury can be repaired. But still, from the d.. ths of this terrible humiliation, a new France shall arise, free, peaceful, more ambitious of the triumphs of industry and science than those of war—and if, as another fruit of this struggle, we shall see a united and free Germany, strong in herself but unaggressive, who shall say that the sacrifice of blood was made in vain? A most responsibility rests upon those who take in hand the political solution of the questions that must now arise for settlement. The future rests with them. If, flushed with victory and maddened by their terrible losses, the Germans insist upon a territorial recompense, upon placing a vassal of Prussia upon the throne of France, and reducing her to the position of a second-rate kingdom, then, indeed, all this precious blood will have been shed in vain. Such a settlement can not be other than hollow and temporary, and the next generation will see the struggle renewed on a greater hatred, and at a more terrible cost of life. But we expect better things of Germany. As the victor, she is brought into responsibilities, and the world will be greatly disappointed if she should insist upon imposing humiliating conditions upon France.

But what of the Emperor? what of the Prince Imperial? and what of the chances for Bonapartism in France? To the first question we would suppose that France, by this time, must be quite cured of imperialism. Had the Emperor, who brought this humiliation upon us, the proudest military people of Europe, shown a spark of moral or physical heroism in the present struggle he might have been otherwise. But he has made respect, and even sympathy, impossible. Incapable in civil affairs, a bloodsoaker and common charlatan in war, his life excites none of the commiseration that always attends the fall of a really great man. He could not even die like a man, when all was lost.

"'Tis done! But yesterday a king,
And armed with kings to strive,
To-day thou art a nameless thing;
So abject—yet alive!"

So wrote LORD BYRON of the first NAPOLEON, and the words are still more applicable to the third. The final glamour of the name, let us hope, is broken forever, and with it the power of "personal government" in Europe. Neither the constitutional rights of the people, even on the throne of France, nor the restoration of the Orleans family, would secure a permanent peace. Neither would do this but a progressive constitutional government, based on the intelligent consent of the people.

THE GREAT SETTLEMENT.

BEFORE this paper is issued, but too late for comment upon its action, the North German Convention of New York will have made its nominations and set forth its principles. What the general character of these will be we should be we have already suggested; and there can be little doubt, from the probable character of the Convention, that it will be as wise and firm as the emergency demands. We say emergency, because so much is really at stake. There is a popular disposition, doubtless, to consider the whole subject of reconstruction finally settled, and sometimes to be impatient of any other view. But it is important that it should be considered settled so long as the Democratic party refuses to acquiesce; and it is improbable that that party will consent to acquiesce so long as the elections apparently show that it is not losing ground. It was very much more likely to object such a policy two years ago than it is now, as the rebel chiefs were willing to yield to terms immediately upon the close of the war which they indignantly repelled a little later. The politics every thing depends upon apparent popular support; and if the Democrats do not think that they have lost, they have gained, during their refusal to acquiesce in the validity of the amendments, they will continue to hold to the question.

But it is a question which must be closed before there can be a normal condition of politics and of public mind. The acquiescence of the Republican party is necessary now, as it was during the war, in order to maintain the Fundamental Law. The Democratic party is not an opposition but a disorganizing party. It is not in the British phrase, "her Majesty's Opposition," assuming a good deal, but upon a policy while it agrees upon all the provisions of the Constitution, but it is a party which denies that certain parts of the Constitution are constitutional, or asserts that, whether constitutional or not, they are not heartily placed in their interpretation. A difference of this kind is vital. The wholly new questions which grew out of the war have been settled by Congress and in the courts of General Grant's time; settlement has been approved by the country. A party which virtually asks the country to declare that those acts again unsettle the question, and to acquiesce in their disposition, should have a very summary answer from all truly honorable and conservative citizens.

To state this fact fairly and strongly in the pending political campaign is the duty of every Republican speaker or writer, and of course to reflect upon it is equally the duty of every voter. It is not a dead issue, because the Democrats choose to keep it alive. How far from dead it is may be seen in the letter of EX-GOVERNOR ORR, of South Carolina, of which we spoke last week, stating his reasons for acting with the Republican party. GOVERNOR ORR was a conspicuous and trusted Democratic leader before the war, and had been the Speaker of the House of Representatives. He was a secessionist, and remained so to the end of the war. But since then he has unequivocally considered the condition of the country, and he sees that the Democratic party, refusing to acquiesce in the great settlement, is a party of which nothing is to be hoped. He therefore unites with the Republicans, and says, reproachfully, to his old associates, who are trying to fight after the battle is over: "If good and true men will not consent to accept the reconstruction acts of Congress, and the legislation Federal and State necessarily growing out of them—if they will struggle against the conditions surrounding us—if they will affiliate with the Republican organization," then they can profit by what has been done, has been well, and can help correct its errors. It is because the Democrats will not do this that he sees the hopelessness of their party, and leaves it.

This is not the only issue of the canvass upon which we now enter in this State, but it is a very vital question. And it is a question not alone for this State, but for the whole country. The Republican party of the Nation is the loyal party. It is the party that would have peace permanent and secure. The importance and the position of New York make the issue very essential, and the progress of the campaign here, which will be watched attentively in all the other States, should leave our friends everywhere, in the whole country, in no doubts as to our attitude upon this question. Let Republican New York believe that the masterdemon of the settlement of the Union as embodied in the reconstruction acts and in the amendments is indispensable to the national peace and prosperity.

HUMANITY IN WAR.

ALTHOUGH the war in Europe was so suddenly begun, and has been waged with such terrible vigor, yet it is clear that the laws and customs of war have been greatly modified, and are already practically more humane than the books describe them. Even so enlightened a writer as HAUTEFEUILLE, as a correspondent of the Evening Post recently mentioned, has written against the abolition of privateering, and has declared not only that private property at sea need not be respected, but that the same property on land is at the mercy of the conqueror. This doctrine, however, as to the rights of the conqueror on land, was denied by another French publicist, PRADIER, FODERÉ, who says emphatically, that, according to the usages of war on land, the belligerents have no right, and can exercise no control over the private property of the subjects of the hostile power; and he asks why the same principles should not be applied to marine war? But this view represents what has been hitherto but a perception of the humane tendency of the modern usages of war. Law on the subject is not made by the books, but by the armies in the field. And it is not the less of the blessings which in this terrible conflict are to be conferred upon civilization, that she, the first military power in the world, is humanizing the usages of war.

The European war was no sooner declared war against Prussia on the 15th of July. On the 19th Prussia announced officially to our Government that privateers in the event that France would not be outdone in humanity. He was not a proper representative of LOUIS NAPOLEON, however, to be left, and he summarily death immediately followed. On the 7th of August, in the first great battle of the war, the Germans won the victory, and entered into France. On the 11th the King issued a proclamation at Saarbrück, in which he said: "We make war against soldiers, not citizens. Therefore the latter may continue secure in person and property so long as they abstain from hostile acts, and respect, unless necessity be at a matter of right." That declaration is the highest tide-mark of humanity in war, if we except the instructions to our Union armies. At different points in this conflict private property not essential to martial necessities, and for the acquisition of which no equivalent was given.

If any one would know the full significance of such a declaration by a conqueror, he need but turn back to the wars of CÆSAR in Gaul, when the old, the women, and the children were indiscriminately slaughtered, and towns were obliterated from the face of the earth; but to the wars waged in Central Europe in the name of CHRISTIANITY called "religious wars," for centuries ago, when the whole land was laid waste, and the suffering of the people was indescribable. It was not until the reign of LOUIS XIV. in the region of the present war, when he made the Palatinate a desert. EVEN MARLBOROUGH was dismayed by the condition to which the wars in which he was engaged reduced the country; and the cruel horrors of those wars are hinted in SOUTHEY'S familiar poem of the "Battle of Blenheim." The stories and the songs of the time are full of the terror which the approach of the enemy inspired, and of the utter demoralization which followed his passage.

War, indeed, is always terrible, often cruel. Its necessities compel perpetually measures, and the innocent individuals among a people whose Government has invited or defied war must often personally pay the penalty. The present war, like all others, is attended with unknown and indescribable sorrow. But it is plain to see that the higher tone of civilization, the better public opinion of the world, modifies and ameliorates its customs. Think, for instance, of the details of the Thirty Years' War, and imagine every soldier or statesman, or other human being of the time, reading such a passage as this in one of the letters from the seat of hostile operations:

"France does not suffer what is technically called the horrors of war. Young girls stand at the cottage doors in the lanes, or street corners, to offer the soldiers pans, and are not harmed by them. The shops open in the towns are plundered. Peaceful citizens go about their business without fear of life or limb. This exemplary civilized war in these respects. But fruit and vegetables are taken along the way-side; and sometimes, when the service soldiers are scarcely turned on the people, and large supplies of food are demanded from the local authorities."

It is the glory of Germany, in a war in which she is really fighting the battle of civilization against anarchy, to act worthily of the great cause by a policy of the highest humanity. From this time the rules of warfare will be much more humane, and what was a generous hope yesterday will be accepted as law to-morrow. Yet no policy can wholly assuage the inevitable bitterness of war. In thousands of homes all over Germany and France at this moment there is a heart-ache and misery such as we in the United States only too freshly remember. History will have no word black enough to describe the guilty author of so vast a calamity.

GREAT BRITAIN A PENITENT.

THE late debates in the British Parliament upon neutrality in war show that our waiting in urging the different negotiations has not been in vain. Indeed, England is generously proceeds our claim. She is going to confession. Not to state it unkindly, she is lighting the candles, and putting on the sheet of penitence. Some of the late speeches are curious reading to a man who has the Parliamentary debates of long our war, and the British decisions of the same period, in his hand, or even in his memory.

It is the most solemn understanding between all civilized powers which accept what is called international law, that their own laws, or what is called municipal law, shall be strictly enforced to secure the due observance of international obligation. As the 13th of May, 1864, a debate arose in the House of Commons upon the case of the Georgia, a rebel vessel of war, which, having been built and equipped in Great Britain, had escaped, and had subsequently returned to Liverpool. MR. THOMAS BAINES took the ground that, as she ought to have been arrested before escaping, she ought to be ordered off upon her return, and forbidden to enter any British port.

The Attorney-General insisted that the British law was sufficiently effective to prevent a breach of neutrality. MR. GLADSTONE was applied, showing the facts, and said that he was only sorry that the ship-owners, at the beginning of the war, had not compelled the executive to put the laws in harmony with the interests of the country and its foreign relations. The law, however, was not unworthy, and when it is amended after the monstrous British ruling so the Alexandra case. The steady reply to our repeated and surprised demands was, that the municipal law of Great Britain should not be altered at the dictation of foreigners, and the positive assurance that the spirit of the existing laws was not observed was wholly disregarded.

Now, however, all is changed. The instant war begins between Germany and France the British Parliament eagerly hastens to amend its imperfect law, in order to secure more timely efficient neutrality. Such an amendment, upon such grounds, shows evidently that we were right in saying that the spirit of the law did not secure it. But it shows more: it shows that what Great Britain during our war was unwilling to do upon our repeated representations, she does at once upon the outbreak of the present war without any request whatever from the Government of France. Such conduct confesses that we were right in saying that her domestic act to secure a faithful observance of international law was defective and inadequate. The Attorney-General, indeed, goes so far as to say, in reference to a provision of the new act requiring that the building of ships be a belligerent: "If such a provision were contained in the present act, the Alabama could not have been built, and the Alexandra must have been condemned."

This is a surrender of the case between the United States and Great Britain. England confesses that under her law as it stood our rights were not protected. It was never claimed that we did not do all that was necessary in supplying testimony to justify the arrest of the Alabama under the British law as it then was. MR. ADAMS'S communications and dispatches were ample, and they were admitted to be so by the tardy order of the Government for the detention of the ship. The plea of the British Government has always been that, upon the presentation of satisfactory evidence that the law was in danger of violation, it took all the measures which the law authorized to stop the vessel, and that its efforts were eluded by the Alabama. The United States said, and had constantly said, that if this statement were true, the law ought to be amended. The Attorney-General of England now declares in parliament that if the law had been amended, the Alabama could not have escaped.

Great Britain, then, by this confession, did not do all that she could to stop the Alabama; and manifestly, therefore, she must confess her responsibility for the consequences. Even if she did every thing that the law authorized, she confesses that the law did not authorize enough to be done. The Attorney-General, indeed, says that the amendment of the law is now passed and not because other nations demand it, but for "the honor and dignity of the crown." But we, of course, never claimed any right to interfere in British legislation. We merely represented to Great Britain, as a power equally interested in international obligation with ourselves, that the British local law was not adequate to the faithful protection of our international rights. Our declaration substantially was that "the honor and dignity of the crown" demanded the amendment of the law. If they demand it now, they demanded it then. If Great Britain is willing to amend the law now, in order that her neutral obligations may be fully enforced toward Germany and France, why was she not willing to amend the law to force the same obligations toward us?

This question will, perhaps, suggest to our English friends who have denied that the feeling of the British Government was hostile to us during our war, that our assertion of an unfriendly disposition was not groundless. That Government really believed with Lord RUSSELL that the cause of the Union was hopeless, and it has no wish to disclaim the motive that were it expected to see arise upon our ruins by making laws to its detriment more stringent. It is not easy to imagine how our nation could put itself more entirely in the wrong toward another than Great Britain has placed herself toward us in the debate and amendment of her neutrality law. It prohibits every thing that we insisted ought to be prohibited, and may not; and ceases rules of proof that we demanded as merely just, and in vain. The debate and the new law are impregnable fortifications of our position. They are the confession of an unions which affected the entire official British conduct toward us during the war; and we do not see how magnanimous British statesmen can longer refuse either to acknowledge the responsibility for our losses by the Alabama, and to settle the bill which is submitted and presented, or to allow that the precedents established by Great Britain at that time are untenable.

THE LITTLE NAPOLEON'S LITTLE GAME.

The intrigues of LOUIS NAPOLEON are coming to light upon all sides. The first disclosure—that of the proposition to absorb Belgium; in fact, to repeat the partition of Poland in another part of Europe—threw a luminous light upon the fine phrases of his proclamation in beginning the war. . . . We wish to conquer a durable peace, based on the true interests of all peoples and to assist in abolishing that precarious condition of things where all nations are forced to employ their resources in arming against each other." These were becoming words, certainly, for a gentleman who, keeping an army up to the highest possible standard, was preparing to another equally armed Government that "the true interests of the quarrel" of Belgium and Luxemburg required their absorption by France.

It appears now, also, that four years ago—in August, 1866—LOUIS NAPOLEON, with the same tender regard for the interests of the people, and the same humane horror of great armies proposed to Prussia to take possession of the German territory upon the west bank of the Rhine, and to that he eyes which Prussia appropriated certain parts of Holland. This was a "secret treaty," which the agent of LOUIS NAPOLEON had received from VICTOR, whither his master had betaken himself for the benefit of his own health and that of Europe. "If you don't agree," said M. BENEDETTI to M. BISMARCK, in the Dirk Turpin tone, "there will be war!" "Then there will be war!" answered BISMARCK.

Again, in 1867, LOUIS NAPOLEON proposed to Austria a little treaty against the power which did not accept his little treaty. He died. He offered to join Austria in insisting that an alliance of Prussia with the South German states should be considered a violation of the treaty of Prague. As the little consideration of this favor to Austria, Prussia was to be required to evacuate Mayence, and Hesse north of the river Main was to go with that south of it. A union of the South German states was to be made, and justice demanded of Prussia for Schleswig-Holstein; and both the Southern German states and Prussia were to be solicited by war if they did not at once accept the invitation. Austria declined.

And now the Jesuit organ in Rome—the same that foreshadowed the Council and the dogma—the Civilta Cattolica, declares that LOUIS NAPOLEON has a secret understanding with Italy that, if the Italian Government is obliged to take possession of Rome, then Piedmont, from Novara to Genoa, including Lombardy, with the island of Sardinia, shall go to France; and, if the people rise in Italy, that France will help to subdue them.

These are some of the secret plots of the gentleman who is so anxious to consult the interests of the people and to reduce standing armies. It is amazing that a man so utterly incapable as this man has shown LOUIS NAPOLEON to be, and so entirely without hold upon the heart of the French nation, should have had it in his power authoritatively to propose such radical changes in the public law. Nevertheless, it is proved to be a permanent conspirator against European peace. And even if the armies of Germany were driven back, and the people of France consented to allow this intriguer to return to the Tuileries, collective Europe might well remember that it has never shown a more conclusive satisfaction than this public disturbed should be kept at home. He has given Europe his right, even when he successful, as he was, to put him under the most stringent bonds to keep the peace.

COUNT GASPARIN UPON THE WAR.

LAST week we printed GASPARIN'S noble protest against the war. But it reached us at the last moment, and we could not therefore give it the conspicuous position which its great significance demanded, and which our readers will have perceived. It is the voice of one of the French men who are honored by the party of liberty every where, and with whom rest the hopes of the peaceful political party of France. His fervid and heroic words are those of a man who dares to tell his countrymen the truth, even when they are intoxicated with glory, and they cover with shame the quibbling apologists of this infamous war.

The protest was written just after the Duke DE GRAMONT'S declaration of war, and begins with the assertion that there is a very considerable party who are bitterly opposed to it, who believe either in the necessity or the lawfulness of the war. He does not admit that France was in any danger, but he does not hesitate to assists that it is a crime to shed a drop of blood for any of the old balance-of-power theories. GASPARIN insists that the war is equally without pretext for the contest; that the candidature of the HOHENZOLLERN was not only known for several months, but was formally officially withdrawn; and, although it may be regretted that the Prussian King did not repeat to BENEDETTI his opposition to the candidature, yet there was no reason for inundating Europe with blood. He loftily protests against the charge of want of patriotism always urged against those who oppose a war wrongfully begun by the country. He indignantly denies that thinking and speaking are to be considered equal to doing. "Action is the final expression of thought, and when words are to be followed by the cannon, and we will not and can not accept the least share of responsibility for them." It is a war which nothing renders lawful in our sight."

One of the last paragraphs in the letter shows that the highest patriotism and the noblest moral and of political morality is familiar to this generous mind.

"There are, I suppose, two kinds of patriotism: that which believes the flag wherever it goes, were it that of LUCIFER on the way to reestablish slavery at San Domingo, and that which stops at its own risk and peril against every thing which seems to it to compromise the country's honor. The first kind of patriotism, the country's honor, the aim is not to win numerous battles, but to practice justice, and to secure for representative and patron of all generous causes. This patriotism also has its martyrs, but it has no victims, and does not aspire to a mediocre place for the country."

The protest of GASPARIN is the voice of that better France which will soon raise the country from the degradation of Napoleonism.

THE LATE U. S. CONSUL AT CANTON.

In the midst of the absorbing news of the summer the death of our late Consul at Canton, in China, has been scarcely observed. But he was one of the men who make the prestige of the name of American, and he should not be forgotten. BERNARD P. CREWOWAN was born in Virginia. His father was a clergyman and a slaveholder, and removed afterward to Indiana. The boy was studious and observant, and from the first perceived the evil character of the slavery in the midst of which he was reared, and resolved to do what he could to overthrow it. In the summer of 1860 he had just left a college in Indiana, and came to St. Joseph, in Missouri, where two other young men were publishing the only English Republican paper out of St. Louis. He offered to contribute what money he had, about $800, to write, and to learn to set type. After the election of MR. LINCOLN hostility in Missouri to every thing Republican became hatred, and the three young men, W. W. WILDER, from Massachusetts, E. M. TRACY, from Missouri, and CREWOWAN, from Virginia, were indicted for publishing an "incendiary sheet." They retired to Kansas, and when the war began the Virginian and the Missourian raised the first company of the first Kansas regiment. CREWOWAN was captain and TRACY lieutenant. Both served through the war. CREWOWAN rapidly rose to be Inspector-General, and served upon the staffs of Generals GRANT and SHERMAN. He was offered the command of regiments, but his generals would not spare him.

The war left him stricken with consumption. He tried farming near St. Louis, and failed. He had friends in Worcester, Massachusetts, and his own evident fitness and charming character, with the most generous letter from General GRANT, made the young Virginian Superintendent of Schools in the very heart of Massachusetts. But his physicians told him that his only chance of life was a softer climate. He rented a place near Richmond, in his native State; bought drives for three cows, and supplied his family by peddling milk. He was better and happy; and, when General GRANT became President, he appointed CREWOWAN Consul at Canton. "I met him at Washington, then," writes a friend: "He was living on pyramid wheaten cake—his wife's—hoping for, reading up China; but painfully short of money for dinners for himself, wife, and two children."

During his brief residence in China Colonel CREWOWAN had won the highest respect and regard of the men whom he had relations of any kind. But his disease was too deeply seated, and he died in the early summer, at the age of thirty-two, with a wife and three children destitute of all but his emeubling memory. We have received from China and elsewhere the most touching and anti-nastic tributes to the remarkable character of Colonel CREWOWAN. tributes which urge with tender eloquence to the people of his countrymen the claims of the wife and children of the young Virginian, who gave all his powers and his life to the great cause of national salvation.

NOTES.

WE observe with very great satisfaction that Secretary COX, in addition to the letter upon the subject of which we recently alluded, forbids all political committees to go through the Department of the Interior to tax the clerks for the purposes of the election. The Secretary may be very sure that his conduct is approved by the best sense of all parties who are not blind to the perils of the present system of our civil service. His action is particularly gratifying in view of a certain organization in Washington—perhaps the very one which the Secretary politely showed to the door—whose avowed resolution upon the subject is truly Pickwickian. This association in a Republican organization. The policy of voluntary contributions as more beneficial than a system of arbitrary assessments, asserts that it is the second duty of every office-holder to contribute liberally, and declaring that those who sell to every man this sentiment we should be inconsistent if we missed, and that their places should be filled by those who will make liberal voluntary contributions. If contributing under penalty of dismissal be voluntary contribution, it would be interesting to know what the gentlemen who adopted this resolution understand by "arbitrary" extortion of money. Nobody knows better than many of the gentlemen of this association that removal, we believe, of office-holders, how niggardly the average salaries of the Government clerks are. Nobody ought to see more clearly than they that their conduct tends to make every election an opportunity for fraud among thousands of citizens. There is no class in the country more vividly interested in a simple and honest election than the men and those who hold office, and one such resolution as that of which we speak from a body of men pledged to civil governments to extend and deepen the intelligent perception that such a reform is becoming imperative upon the country.

THE doctors utterly disagree. Bishop BAILEY, of New Jersey, who has just returned from the Œcumenical Council, says, in an address to his people, that the Roman Catholic Church "has always believed in infallibility, that it is one of its accepted doctrines, and that it was never needed was to be confirmed by council." Father HYACINTHE says, in his late letter, published in Paris, that "the doctrine unknown to the ecclesiastical antiquity, which is disputed, even by so numerous and eminent theologians, and which implies not a regular development, but a radical change in the constitution of the Church and in the fundamental rule of its faith." Father HYACINTHE may be a very uncomfortable brother in the Church, but his knowledge of history and of its accepted faith is unquestionable. "I refuse to believe implicitly," he said, when in this country, "all the declarations and traditions of the Church in which I was born and bred makes me a Roman Catholic, then I am nothing else."

IT is not too late to say a word of tender remembrance of the late JOSEPH HOWE. A man of the gentlest nature and most generous impulse, his convictions upon the great subjects of human interest were profound and inflexible. He had been long prominent in our politics, and his singular facility in public speaking, and the unwon freshness of his zeal for the triumph of the principles which were dear to him, kept him an always welcome and honored favorite of the people almost to the last. For sixty years he had lived in the city of New York identified with its progress, and pleasantly familiar to its citizens, none of whom probably heard of his death without a kind word or thought for his memory. The writer of these lines can never forget with what a glow of pride and color MR. HOWE, a few years since, entered upon a local political campaign, to whose immediate result the writer was most interested than he. The issue was evident from the beginning; but the youthful energy and humorous eloquence of MR. HOWE lighted up the whole campaign; while his plain, practical, and vivid presentation of the questions of the time kept a permanent benefit to his hearers. MR. HOWE'S health had gradually failed for some months past, and he returned to the town of ROGER WILLIAMS, in which he was born, only to close peacefully his long and spotless life.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR IN FRANCE.

THE attempt of Marshal M'MAHON to relieve Marshal BAZAINE has ended in a supreme disaster to himself. That General was to march from CHÂLONS with energy and rapidity and by before his plans should be known to the enemy. He was to join with BAZAINE, and, uniting their two armies, fall upon the besiegers with an overwhelming and crushing force. But the natural genius, the Crown Prince of Prussia seems to the movement, and, at once divining its import, made haste to prevent it. MARSHAL M'MAHON.

In spite of the reverses suffered by the French army under Marshal M'MAHON, this General is still considered, both in and out of France, as a truly brave and skilful leader. He has been justly styled the true type of a military hero.

Singularly calm in the field, yet possessing great promptitude of decision and indefatigable activity, Marshal M'MAHON, with an equal force, and on his own ground, would prove a dangerous antagonist even to VON MOLTKE himself, as the brave though vain manner in which he has contested vastly superior forces at Wörth, and in the more recent battles, fairly testifies. Though a strict martinet, he is a great favorite with his troops, and especially with the rough and unruly Turcos.

THE CROWN PRINCE OF PRUSSIA.

PRINCE FREDERICK WILLIAM NICHOLAS CHARLES, Crown Prince of Prussia, of whom we give an admirable portrait on our first page, was born the 18th of October, 1831, and is the only son of WILLIAM I., by AUGUSTA, daughter of the late CHARLES FREDERICK, Grand Duke of SAXE-WEIMAR. The PRINCE was indebted to his mother for a most careful education, not only in those things which, by tradition, form the education of kings, but in all branches of study. The Queen herself had been a pupil of GOETHE'S, and was, therefore, prepared to appreciate what we may term the higher, nobler, and more refining knowledge, and to be anxious that her son should receive its benefit. GOERZ and the historian MAX DUNCKER were the young Prince's instructors in these studies, while VON ROON and VON MOLTKE grounded him in those principles of the military art which he has since turned to such good account.

The record of his military career is too well known to need recapitulation here, and we will speak only of those kindly traits of character which have made him one of the most popular princes and generals of any age. "A country cut," says a correspondent, writing after the great battle of Wörth, "was rumbling down the street with two wounded officers. An officer on foot beckoned to the driver to stop, and went up to the cart, the occupants of which tried to salute him, but he made a gesture, and, leaning over, entered into conversation with them for ten minutes, evidently asking after their wounds. On parting, he shook each by the hand, and continued his way up the street, accompanied by two other officers. He halted at my quarters, and inquired if there were any wounded inside—they had been removed, some to their last resting-place—then went on, and meeting a cart full of wounded soldiers, talked to them each in turn, and so went on visiting the hospitals and the wounded in a most unostentatious manner." This officer was the Crown Prince, the "FRITZ" of the old King's telegram, and after reading this account we do not wonder at the devotion of his men.

MARSHAL M'MAHON.

Another correspondent, M. HENRI CHABRILLART, of the Paris Figaro, who fell into the hands of the Prussians after the battle of Wörth, had an interview with the Prince, and thus describes his appearance: "Prince FREDERICK WILLIAM is a man of tall stature, thin, with a calm and placid countenance; but in the curve of his aquiline nose and his dilating nostrils there are evidences of energy, while the rapidity of his glance convinces you of his decision. A full fair beard softens the somewhat stern expression of his features. He has great simplicity of manner, and affects rather a kind of bourgeois style of speaking, thinking, and general behavior. He was dressed in a black tunic with red collar and facings, without any embroidery or gold braid; upon the shoulder a small epaulet to indicate his rank, but no other distinguishing ornament. He wore a small black cap bordered with red, and the whole uniform was severely simple. He speaks French with great purity, without foreign accent beyond a slight German intonation and occasional hesitation at certain words."

He spoke, says the Figaro correspondent, with great admiration of the way in which the French fought. "Among the prisoners," said he, "is General RAOULT. I went this morning to see him at Reichshofen, where he lies wounded, his hip and thigh being broken; I fear that he is now dying. He is a brave officer, and he has given me some addresses in Paris to which he wishes letters to be sent." "But, Prince," M. CHABRILLART observed, "the other prisoners also have families." "I have thought of that. I have had them supplied with writing materials; the letters will be sent unsealed to our consul at Geneva, who will forward them to France." "Prince, we thank you on behalf of the mothers whose grief you are about to assuage." "I do not like war, gentlemen. If I should reign I would never make it."

CHAPTER I.

Description of the Island.—Its Volcanic Origin.—Frequent and Terrible Eruptions.—The Town of Forshaven.—The Vikings.

IN a certain part of the ocean, far to the north, in a region of almost arctic cold, there lies a vast mass of volcanic matter, many thousand square miles in extent, which has been thrown up from the bottom of the sea, or, rather, which is still in process of being thrown up, for a large portion of it is still in a state of the most violent eruptive commotion. There are caldrons and craters without number, boiling, roaring, and throwing up, in some places, bursts of steam and scalding mud and water, and in others, projecting into the air, with thundering explosions, red-hot stones, and streams of lava, to add by their fall to the already enormous accumulation.

And yet so cold is the region into which this igneous eruption ascends that many of those portions of the accumulated mass which rise above the reach of the fire are covered with a mantle of perpetual ice and snow. The glaciers and the drifts climb up the mountain-sides to the very brink of the volcanic crater, and in the winter, even in the lowlands, crowd close to the margin of every boiling lake and caldron.

The name of this vast and chaotic accumulation is Iceland. It might as well have been named Fireland, for the eruptions that have been going on in it for two thousand years between ice and fire is still raging, with no very decisive indications yet in respect to the result of the contest.

One might perhaps imagine the possibility of some portions of a vast chaotic upheaval like this being so situated within the narrow bounds which separate the arctic cold from the volcanic fire, as in process of time to clothe themselves with a sanity vegetation, and that possibly some forms of animal life might be sparingly developed in it; but no one would have thought of such a region being chosen as the home of a human community. And yet around the borders of the island, on the confines of a shore indented by innumerable inlets and bays, the sea has sent in vapors and rain which, in process of ages, have so smoothed the asperities and softened the surface of the chasms and ravines and deep abysses among the rocks, as to give them the character, during the brief summer season, of green and fertile valleys, where man can find the means of supplying some of his wants; and the shores themselves, with the boundless abundance of animal life with which the sea in those northern regions teems, provide for the rest. There has been a time when a hundred thousand people found their homes and their subsistence in the narrow fringe of verdure lying between a stormy sea on the one side, and on the other a vast interior of ice and fire. They had nearly five hundred thousand sheep to climb the slopes and crop the grass in places inaccessible to human culture, and herds of cattle and of horses in proportion for lower grounds. Here they lived, cut off in a great measure—and for certain seasons entirely—from all communication with the great family of man, and hemmed in between two sets of terrible combatants, who were engaged all the time in a most savage contest with each other—the wildest winds contending with the stormiest seas below them, and behind them a still more frightful conflict between the crashing avalanches of ice and snow, and the thundering explosions of volcanic fire.

Nor were they themselves at all respected in their peaceful avocations by these angry combatants. As the consequence of one of these eruptions, near the close of the last century, more than ten thousand people lost their lives in the destruction caused by it, and by the resulting pestilence and famine; and a hundred and fifty thousand domestic animals were starved!

FORSHAVEN—CAPITAL OF THE FAROE ISLANDS.

A SCHOOL OF WHALES.

A residence in this terrible region of danger and isolation may be tolerable during the intervals of comparative repose which sometimes prevail among the conflicting elements surrounding it; but when the paroxysms of activity return, the situation of those exposed to them must be awful in the extreme. When we consider how much the terror and suffering of being driven from one's home into the streets by fire is intensified by the conflagration's occurring when the thermometer is at zero, in a temperate clime, we can see that the eruption of a volcano among human dwellings, in the midst of an arctic winter, with little day and little warmth to be looked for for months to come, must be the most awful of all human calamities.

And yet, fearful as such a region must be, considered as a permanent home for a community of human beings, the features of strange grandeur and sublimity which it presents have a great attractiveness for the traveler who visits it in the intervals during which the severity of the elemental conflicts of which it is the scene is somewhat relaxed, and the country enjoys seasons of comparative repose. The Gulf Stream, though its force is well-nigh spent before it reaches the region, still carries some warmth during the long summer to these shores, and the gentle rains which come from its vapors cause the grass to grow, and make the glens and valleys green. Journeys into the interior may then be made, and some of the most wonderful volcanic phenomena on the globe can be quietly observed. By these attractions adventurous travelers are often drawn to the island, notwithstanding the remoteness of its inhospitable shores, and the stormy and inclement seas that must be traversed to reach them.

If the traveler, in visiting Iceland, comes from a port in the British Isles, he passes on his way the group of the Faroe Islands, consisting of one vast rock, with a number of smaller ones around it, long since thrown up from the sea by forces similar to those now in action in Iceland. At the Faroe Isles, however, the conflict has long since ceased. The fire has spent its force and withdrawn from the field, leaving the towering summits and vast chasms and caverns which the group presents to view as trophies of its former power.

As the traveler passes this group, perhaps the steamer stops to anchor for a day in the only harbor, that of Forshaven. Forshaven is the capital of the islands, but with that sounding title it is, after all, only a very small hamlet, consisting only of a few houses, and an unpretending fort upon a bluff overlooking the harbor—the only refuge of the fishing vessels which share with the sheep and cattle on the hills the duty of providing these exiles from the human family with their scant and precarious supplies of food. They may well be called exiles, for the seas around them are so incessantly agitated with currents, eddies, and whirlpools, formed by the flux and reflux of the tides among the sunken rocks, and the air as subject to sudden and baffling gusts, and to sweeping and long-continued gales, that sometimes for a long period no craft that depends upon sails can safely approach the coasts, and during such times the isolation of the community from the outer world is complete.

Still the inhabitants of the Faroe Islands are not exposed to the appalling dangers and terrors which are always impending over Iceland. Far to the north "as they are, being in the latitude of the southern part of Hudson Bay and the southern part of Greenland, by the influence of the Gulf-stream, and the deflection to the northward, through other causes, of the isothermal lines in those longitudes, the cold of the winter is so moderated that the grass remains green, and the sheep and cattle feed on the lower hills, during the whole season. We do not know how influences the country would be entirely uninhabitable, as the regions in corresponding latitudes are on the eastern coast of this continent. The whole of Labrador lies entirely to the southward of these islands, and yet on his east coast the Labrador except such as can derive its sustenance from the sea.

The voyager, in continuing his course, encounters wild and stormy seas, but he is astonished to find how full the water and the air in these half arctic regions are of animal life. The shores and the shallow waters near them swarm with fish; while the more secluded and protected recesses of rocks he finds the air alive with millions of aquatic birds; and sometimes the ship approaches a school of whales that rise to the surface, spout their columns of water into the air, and then plunge down.

It is only during the season of summer that these seas are entirely free from ice-encumbrance. It is then almost one continued day, for the sun in his course disappears only for an hour or two below the horizon; and even then the atmosphere is so brightened by the twilight that night by night only the stars of the lowest class, those that are an offset to this, the sea is agitated with almost perpetual storms. It was amidst these storms, and this wild war of winds and waves, that the old Northmen were nurtured—the Vikings or sea-kings, with their fellows, who, in long voyages and in the art of navigation amidst these cold and stormy seas, and inured themselves to every hardship which the roughest water and the most inclement skies could bring, at length made their way southward to the coasts of England and France, and, under the name of Danes and Normans, made incursions and settlements there, and laid the foundation of the great commercial nations of the present and of those great nations. They were born and driven out by these storms. They won their boys and lords by their dependence upon the sea for food, and the superiority of seafaring life at every season and in spite of starvation. And then the present maritime grandeur of England and France may be traced back to its origin in the courage and skill with which hunger inspired these poor fishermen, a thousand years ago, in encountering the brave, in search of sustenance, the dangers of these stormy northern seas.

The name of the principal harbor of Iceland is Reykjavik. The engraving represents its appearance as approached from the sea. In the centre of the town is seen the church, the most prominent structure. A building on the slope of the hill, upon the east side of the town, is the residence of the Danish Governor—the island being a Danish possession. A large structure, one of the first settlement of the Danish colony upon it, which is highly characteristic of the times when the events to be here occurred, will be given in another chapter.

CHAPTER XV.

SOLOMON'S REMINISCENCES.

THERE are wild places yet in the world, and primitive folk. Even in England there are localities of which the phrase, "It is a hundred years behindhand," still holds good; and so it was with Gothin. Its wind-eyed moors, its rock-bound coast, had inhabitants altogether differing from the men of fields and farms; to Rich. and, a man of experience from the town, they seemed a foreign race. They were rough in externals, but kindly and genial at heart; given to hospitality, and, though good at a bargain, by no means greedy of gain. Above all there were no beggars. The poorest Gothin man would give you all he owns, or walk a hundred yards out of his way to show you your road, without asking for, or even thinking of, a coin. They were, however, so delighted as surprised to get it; and before the men-landed young artist had been a week in the place he had demoralized it by his largesses. As, however, his smile and his thanks always accompanied his presents, he was voted a trump, for love's sake than the money's, and enjoyed a popularity which must be particularly gratifying, yet is impossible to be won by one who has nothing to give. He had the reputation among these simple folks, who knew how to be frugal themselves, of having a superfluity of wealth; his air and manner showed he had been always used to be lavish (as indeed he had), and nowhere did this fiction, which extended, though upon other grounds, to the tenants of the Hall, work more effectually than in the improvident youth; but the former was well aware that the guests of Carew of Crompton were almost without exception very wealthy men, and he judged of Richard's social position accordingly. He had no idea that his landscape-painting was anything else than an amusement—as it was practiced by half the young ladies and gentlemen who visited Gothin in the summer months; he took him for an amateur; and if he saw one of his sketches, and been a judge of art, he would have been only fortified in his conclusion. He had had the opportunity, but in his own account, though not so much as his handsome face and pleasant manners, recommended him to the hostesses, caused others to do; for Mr. Trevelick was not at all impressionable in such matters. Richard found him, in his heart of hearts, the drop of regard he seemed to get out of him, notwithstanding all his efforts to the contrary, and a desperate effort to make himself agreeable and with so small a result; but his self-love would have been more deeply wounded had he known that his own exertions would not have even gained him that. They did, had they not been succeeded by a hidden ally in the landlord's breast. Richard's desire to conciliate was fully appreciated by Trevelick, and he was grateful to all things to make friends with the friend of Parson Whymper, only vouchsafed as swarthy a welcome to his line. The old man and the young had absolutely nothing in common except their love for Harry.

Upon the other hand, John Trevethick and Solomon Coe were cast almost in the same mould. Sure-Christian-ship and self-importance was the intelligent and shrewd enough in practical matters, but ignorant, dogmatic, and pedantic in theories. Deprived of his undergrowed occupation by the catastrophe with which we are acquainted, he had at his wit's end how to fill up the interval with which he had hitherto but physically concerned himself; and the labor of the hands was nearly proved his tonic. Solomon's inventive genius had found its exercise in the making of bird-traps, and the money which they realized, and the money this acquired he had not scattered away (as small in such cases) in speculative investments, but had increased it by laying up his trade and his reaping the fruits of his inventions by himself. He was considered a wealthy man, and that had made him very cautious. But he had a small share in Dunlopped, which seemed likely to pay very profitably indeed; he had built the inn, the returns from which were more than sufficient for his wants; and he had communicated that John Trevethick had been laying by a pretty penny, and could hold his head much higher than he did. The investments were certainly not expensive, for they consisted in fancy iron-working, the results of which he kept him in profound ignorance of, and in occasionally getting drunk, which, being a publican, he could accomplish at the most reasonable cost.

He was a hard unlovable man, and interesting only as statistics may be said to be as compared with romance. Of feeling he had none, when once his resolution was fixed, his will was iron, and his temper of the same material. More curious than one of Trevethick's characters should have entertained such a feeble kind of appreciation of gratitude even to a man that had saved his life at the expense of his own; but even this may be read by the light of Solomon's will. He had saved been his wife or his daughter the feeling would not perhaps have been the stronger, and in carrying it out, as he fully purposed to do, by bestowing Harry's hand upon Solomon, he was certainly not unanswered by the fact that in the latter was, peculiarly speaking, an excellent match.

Like himself, his intended son-in-law was the architect of his own fortunes; but he had built them up in a different way. His youth had been spent in the coal-mines of the north; and, though no lucky stroke of the pick can there be said to make rich, as it can in other underground localities, his strength and skill had met with their full reward. And what he had gained he had not lost. Pound after pound he had laid by, until enough had been saved for investment; and it was then he came to hoast in after-years that he had never got less than ten per cent. for any of it. It was all ventured on mortgage-speculations, and upon the hazardous enough—but all bad prospered; and here John Trevethick's judgment came in play, and man himself had not the courage to follow it, had been of great advantage to him. Every thing he touched came to gold. He had but to tap a tin or copper; and before the lode ceased to yield Solomon had sold his shares at a good profit, or, am, and placed the proceeds in another pit. He had sown, as it were, his money in the earth, and reaped a golden crop. Harry's father, Samuel, his last venture, seemed likely to prove his best; and it was another proof of the strength of character in himself and Trevethick that the latter had also a share in that undertaking. These are common-place facts in a common-place century interest is the most binding tie of sympathy of which human nature is capable; and it had the landlord of the Gothin Castle been more closely attached to his guest and son-in-law elect during the time of Richard's visit, York proposed to himself to part them; as though a gilded summer skiff should thrust itself between two Indian coal-barges, and bid them bodge.

It was at least a week before Solomon Coe could be induced to open his lips before Richard beyond the utterance of a few pithy sentences; and then that the unwonted silence of the latter was broken in the mean time—for Richard has been prudence itself in his behavior to Harry—the old man had come to the conclusion that the young fellow, and therefore distrusted him. The light and airy manners, which were as natural to Richard as was John Trevethick's ponderous cunning or his own self-satisfied reticence, seemed to Solomon mere affectation, and even his appearance effeminate and dandified; but when he saw that he were no other air when conversing with the pitmen of Dunloppd—an expedition undertaken with himself at Richard's special invitation—and that they were actually he climbed the tall, steep ladders, and how fearlessly he trusted himself to the rude machinery, his estimate of such artful properties. Of Richard's intelligence he had formed a good opinion from the time when first the company was formed—that his prejudice against Richard was quite surmounted when Solomon began to unfold to him, over their pasty in the bar parlor, the annals of his underground career. Often had he done so to Harry—like Governor Golding, Coe had an swarthy) narrowing his subventures to his Desdemona—but never had he been so full of his theme, and never before had he had to seem to hear, and, without the penalty of reply, could feel her eyes upon you; Richard's listening was real. It had when, in the face for woman's favor, one has to unste one's breath in making the running for one's rival.

And yet the old Solomon Coe was well worth listening to. He told of the great way in which he had been engaged to burn beneath the earth against the powers of Water, and Fire, and Foul Air, and of the daring with which he had won wrought Cornish miner of his calling. Having the hole was large enough for them to carry us through it in their arms."

"And there was nobody else saved, was there?" inquired the landlord, with a triumphant look.

"There was not," said Solomon, expressing his tobacco smoke very slowly. "Out of a hundred and thirteen men who had been caught by the flood in Dunloppen we two were the sole survivors."

Many other stories of the like sort had Solomon to tell, and for not one of them was he indebted to his imagination. His experience of life had been remarkable, and it had not improved itself upon his character. His will was as strong as that of Tarvelrath, but he had fewer cautions; and he was at the same time both plodding and audacious.

It would not be well, thought Richard occasionally, to have either of these men for an enemy; and he might, indeed, unhappily, it was a possible two with Harry without a quarrel with, at least, one of them, and rather than lose her he was prepared to defy them both. If he found but have lifted a corner of the curtain that veils the future—well, even then, no man was to be by this time with the love of her, that he would almost have defied them still.

CHAPTER XVI.

SETTING-TIDE.

THERE is a beauty in woman that takes the stranger, and another the changeful charm of which wins its way deeper and deeper daily into the heart of man; but in the person of Harry Trevethick these two beauties were combined. Richard thought he had never seen any face half so fair as that which shone upon him through the mist on the first day when he came to Gedna; and when he had dwelt there for a month it was of the same opinion still. Harry was innocent, unprotected, and gay. Not only did the expression of her features told you truth; but it also told you more than that, which you must needs believe, though it was not in words. The face was not the index of her mind in all respects; it was rather like the transparent and costly dial-plate of a time-piece the works of which are indifferent. Her air was spiritual; her voice betrayed your being set to music; and her eyes were full of earnest tenderness: but she was weak of purpose, vacillating in her likes and dislikes, credulous, and given (not from choice, but fear) to dissimulation. That last fault Richard willingly forgave her, since it was done for his advantage: and to the others he would have been more than human had he not been blind. For Richard loved him. She had not told him so: he had never asked her to say so; but it was taken for granted on both sides. "Love is but brown much together, for Dunloppel—a treasure-house, which proved richer and richer the more it was ransacked—monopolized the time of both Trevethick and Solomon: they were in high good-humor, and not at all disposed for a quarrel or suspicion. Harry had always been the mistress of her own movements, and she went, as usual, whither she liked, and Richard went with her.

The spring was advancing, and brought its soft hues even to the barren moors of Gethin, and bathed its gray rocks in sunshine. There was much to see that was worth seeing, and with so fit as Harry to point out those objects of attraction with which she had become familiar from her childhood? They strolled along the beach to Polwheel, and she showed him how the harbor there had been silted up through the wiles of the mermaids, or "merry maids," as she called them, still under favorable circumstances when at times seen sitting on the slate cliff ledges beneath the clear blue sea. Far from ridiculing her superstitions, he led on to talk of them that he did not much mind what she talked about so long as he could look at her and listen.

"But why were the Polwheel mermaids so cruel, Harry? I always imagine them bright and beautiful beings, with graceful waving hair as long as yours, and with nothing to do but to comb it."

"That is so, when they are let alone," said Harry, simply; "but even the weakest creatures love revenge, and will get it if they can."

"And quite right too," interrupted Richard; "but for fear of that the strong would be more unlovely even than they are."

"Well, a mermaid was once cruelly treated by a Polwheel man—he left her in the pool, and deserted her—and then her sisters choked up the harbor bar."

"But how did he come to court the mermaid? That must have been difficult; though, if I were you sitting under water combing your hair, I should certainly dive, and try."

"I would have no breath to make out pretty speeches then," said Harry, demurely. "This mermaid was, however, a changed child. A Polwheel woman was bathing her infant in the pool yonder beneath that arched rock, when it suddenly gave a cry of joy, and leaped from her arms into the sea. She thought it was the mermaid, but it came up the next instant more beautiful and bright than ever. She did not herself know but that it was her own child, but there were old folks in the town who knew that it was in reality a mermaid's changeling. She grew up to be a lovely woman, and the Squire of Polwheel at that time—for his race has died out since—fell in love with her; he treated her very ill, and she died broken-hearted, at Gethin, and was buried in our church-yard, where I can show you the tomb."

"And did no punishment overtake the scoundrel Squire?"

"Yes. After a great revel one night, he was returning home by the sands, and in the moonlight beheld a beautiful lady sitting by this same pool. She was so like his dead love to look at that he was frightened at first, but she smiled and beckoned to him, and then, clasping him in her arms, leaped into the sea, and drowned him; and in the storm that arose that night the merry maids filled up the harbor."

"That was hard upon Polwheel," observed Richard, "though the Squire only got what he deserved. He must have been a wicked man."

"But the mermaid was very foolish to believe him," added Harry—"was she not?"

They visited the Fairy Bower, did these young people—a pretty spot quite worthy of its name; a grove; a beautiful ravine, with a full of water, and a careened cell beside it, where a solitary hermit was said to have dwelt. Notwithstanding which elaborate association, it had a nothing-but besides, into which a maiden "but" to drop a pin, and, wish her wish, and straightway the face of her future husband was mirrored in the water. Though Harry was the only one who ever ventured to the bottom of the pool quite paved with pins.

"And can the charm ever work?" asked Richard, laughing. "Try it to-day."

"No, no," answered Harry, gravely; "one must be alone, and must go to the pool only by moonlight."

On Merven Point, a grand old promontory, which jutted out many a yard to meet the encroaching waves, and battled with them long before they reached the main land, they sat and watched the sunsets; looked down upon the busy hive of men that worked upon the slate quarry beneath, or gazed upon the ships that tacked and wore to make Turlock Haven. There was a tower on this place, half ruined and with a broken steps, up which they climbed together on one occasion, and stood supporting one another upon its dizzy summit, while they looked down upon splendid prospect of sea and land, but they were looking into one another's eyes, and they could not watched the sunsets; looked down upon the busy hive of men that worked upon the slate quarry beneath, or gazed upon the ships that tacked and wore to make Turlock Haven. There was a tower on this place, half ruined and with a broken steps, up which they climbed together on one occasion, and stood supporting one another upon its dizzy summit, while they looked down upon splendid prospect of sea and land, but they were looking into one another's eyes, and they could not speak of that which was nearest to their hearts. It was a topic to be avoided as long as possible. They were happy in their present opportunities—they had only been permitted to thus hold out together alone since yesterday—and with the tacit understanding that no such thing as love could exist between them. If Harry had been plighted faith to another, or Richard owned to him tacitly existed nevertheless, and it was under the agis alone that they could have enjoyed that indulgence. It was a part of the character of the young girl to persuade herself that she was not deceiving him in this way, and indeed it was certain that delusion; and it was all one to Richard what their love was called as long as it existed. She, in fact, was alone together in the noonday stillness, his arm around her waist, as he laid his head since that day upon the pillow of the casted rock, he must needs have told her why the heart that pressed so close against her side was beating so fast. But he was happy, he dared not. Suppose that, by any possibility, he had mistaken her sentiments, and that she had an extorted promise, or fear of her father's anger, or what not, should compel her to deny her love, and deem herself bound to confess that her simplicity was such—and was in some things most unreasonably great—that he interpreted her affection as that of a brother—a friend of her father's and of "Sol's"—but no: he felt certain that she loved him; and even if, by events, or whatever reason, she was once again to reprove him for indulging in these sentiments, he would feign that such a rebuke must of necessity finish all. She could not forgive him twice, unless she gave him license to continue to love her. He was not, therefore, speak directly of that which both were thinking of; and yet he could not altogether ignore so sweet a subject.

"That is the moor yonder, Harry, over which first came to Gedna—how long ago?"

"Has the time, then, hung so very heavy on your hands?" asked she, seriously.

"No, Harry, on the contrary, I have never been so happy: but when one has a new experience never changes, one is apt to look back to dwindle down one's past to nothing. I have had two lifetimes, as it seems to me—one in which I was, and one here: and yet it is but six weeks since I met you first, Harry, out yonder, gleaming like a unbroken through the mist."

"I remember it well," said Harry, with a slight shiver.

"But not to sigh about it, dear, I trust? You are not afraid of me now, as you were then? Do you remember how scared you were that I called you back that day?"

"Yes, well," answered the young girl, earnestly. "I had a reason, and I was scared, though you would laugh at me if I told you what it was."

"Indeed! I will not laugh, Harry, when you believe me serious—indeed, I will not, proscribably. "Come, tell me why you shrieked to me—now you can tell me all, dearest, for, see, I have got you close—and why your large eyes looked so wild and strange at me? Was it what you mad? Did you take me for a ghost?"

"No; but I had just seen what is far worse than any ghost. Just a minute before you came, I got that same night? I thought I should have fainted when I was asked."

She put the question, but Solomon's name was never mentioned between those two young people. Yet I think they understood each other. It was one that very day—only a few minutes before I met poor—and no wonder she was pale.

"Well, and what then?" said Richard, smiling. "Neither your father, nor any one in whom you have an interest, grew to sea. The Flying Dutchman did not concern you, I reckon, even if he did pay you a call."

"You do not understand," said Harry, seriously; "it was not that at all. But when the moon rise over Turlock sands, as they did that day, a black, square-rigged vessel glides across them, which bodes ill to those who see her; and I saw her as plain as I see you."

"But not to-day," said Richard, fondly.

"She was coming from Turlock to the quarry yonder—"

"To fetch slates," interrupted the other—"nothing more likely."

"Nay, not she; no craft would have attempted that in such weather; and, besides, there was not a soul on board of her. She was sailing alone: what little wind there was, and against the tide."

"But even if this was so, Harry, what of it? What have I to fear?"

"Nothing as yet; nor was I greatly frightened at the time. That omen bodes unhappiness to him or her who sees it, and I was already unhappy."

"Because I was not here to comfort you, Harry. Well, that is remedied."

She shook her head, and did not return the reassuring pressure of his hand. "Listen!" she said. "The misery comes through the person whom he will see: the vision shall never meet; and I thought I knew who I should meet on my way home—as from yonder—when sunk her voice to a whisper—"I already expected misery."

"I see mean—" began Richard, eagerly.

"No matter whom I mean. It was not he who met me; that was you."

The hand which he held in his was cold as ice; her face was pale; and her limbs trembled under her.

"This is folly, Harry dear. Am I likely to do you harm, and can you miserable?"

"I do not know," said she. "I sometimes think you are."

He put the long hair back from her forehead, and gazed into her eyes, which were now fast filling with tears. "I love you, Harry, with all my heart; but—but—you know I do. And, though you are sometimes cold, and at others seem as though you would have avoided me, I think you love me—just a little—too. Better, at all events, than the man with whom you were last night! And you expect nothing but misery."

"Hush, hush!" moaned she. "If I said that, it was very wrong."

"It was the truth, Harry. How could it be otherwise? There is not a love most for such as you; he is twice your age, and rough and rude of speech and as a sailor. Do you think he will be more tender when he is a husband? He is no mate for you, Harry, nor you for him."

Again all was silence, but with a slow mournful movement, as though less in descent from his superstitious dejection or remedy.

"What!" cried he, "because his father was your father's friend, does that give him the right to be your husband?"

The young girl answered only with her sobs.

"Now tell me, Harry dear—did you ever promise to be this man's wife in words?"

"Yes—no—I am not sure. He yes, I must be; but I am not sure that he put upon it. Nay, do not smile at that; you don't know what my father is. He is not one to cross; and, if at the very thought of her stern parent's wrath, she lifted up her head from Richard's breast, and looked around her.

"But suppose I win him to my side, sweet Harry?"

"That you could never do," sighed she. "I tell you you don't know him."

"Nay, but I think I do, dear; and, if I could show him that it was to his own advantage to have me for his son-in-law, in place of—"

"You could not persuade him," interrupted the young girl, firmly;—"not even if you were Caesar of Cæsars, and he Pompey."

The words she had used were meant to express exhaustless wealth, but with such a sad corner of fresh association still excited in that far-away Richard, "I say not be Caesar to my father's fortune."

Harry shook her head. "He wants for nothing, Richard, and that you can give him. He is wealthier than you imagine. He has two thousand pounds in notes, for with such was the money paid to me strong-box in my room. But there, I promised not to speak of that."

"I am not a beggar in disguise," said Richard, smiling, "and would make your father richer rather than rob him. But why should he keep so large a sum by him?"

"I do not know; but there it is, locked with a letter padlock which he made himself. No human being can open it, he says, who does not know the secret."

Richard was silent. Something else than love was occupying his thoughts, though his fingers were making new gratings for themselves of Harry's golden hair. It is like entertaining angels unawares to find after one has fallen in love that it is a wife and not a man.

"Dear Harry," said he at last, "I think I will better pocket

FORWARD, O comrades, the time will come
When the signal gun shall flash,
And the blare of bugle and roll of drum
Shall join with the rifle's crash.
Then the ranks of the foe shall be crushed and riven,
They shall scatter before us like chaff in storm-driven;
But steadily now, till the word is given,
Then go with a dash.

Up to and brave who be only brave
In the fervor of the fight;
The truest courage is sober and grave,
And steadfast in its might.
'Tis waiting and watching, and trying time most,
When terrible silence is over the host—
Keep steady, and each man at his post
Close up—steady—right.

But a little longer—'Tis deadly still—
Will the signal never come?
Now—ready, trumpeter, blow with a will,
Beat, drummer, upon your drum;
For waiting is over—there booms the gun!
Look to your rifles—stand steady each one!
Now, forward, O comrades mine, with a run;
Hurrah! strike home!

ROMANCE IN A RAILWAY.

BY JUSTIN M'CARTHY.

Two young barristers, traveling from London to Liverpool, took their seats one evening in a first-class carriage of the 6 o'clock express at the Euston Square Station—a station known, I venture to think, to every American who has ever invaded the old country. There were only two other seats occupied in the compartment entered by the two young men. Two ladies—at least, a lady and her maid—were the other occupants. The lady was young and pale and pretty; the maid was a fresh, blooming, round-cheeked country girl—the moment she spoke a word her accent made it plain to one of the two advocates, himself from the Midland of Northern England, that the girl came from dear old Cumberland. Two gentlemen, one apparently the young lady's father, attended her to the carriage door, and waited at the door until the train started and moved off. They both, especially the one who seemed set to exercise parental authority over the young lady, kept insistently eating expectant, eager, suspicious eyes about the platform, as if they looked for or dreaded the arrival of somebody. These little facts the two barristers, accustomed to note small things and construct them into evidence, observed almost unconsciously and by the sheer force of habit.

The older man, whom both the youths learned in law assumed to be the father of the departing young lady, at last nodded significantly to the other, and said, in a low tone: "It is all right, Cunningham. He is not here. Thank Heaven!"

"He can't come now," said the other.

"It would not have much mattered even if he did," the elder observed. "He should not have exchanged a word with her—not one word! But I'm glad to escape scenes and tears and confusion for all that."

The lady in the carriage had heard nothing of this. She sat at the further side of the compartment. Doubtless what was said would never have been spoken were she near enough to hear it. Or she had never Eureka, however, to hear it—in fact, he could not help himself; he had no chance but to hear.

The elder of the two speakers had taken a farewell of the girl when he put her into the carriage—that is, he kissed her very coldly, and said good-by, and added a few whispered words, which seemed to be something in the nature of a exception or a menace. Now, as the train moved off, he only nodded a farewell. He had a formally handsome face, pale, cold, and hard, with thin lips and very white teeth.

The train then went on, and soon whirled through the pleasant suburbs of that side of London, and away into the open country. The young lady seemed very melancholy and quite pale. She replied gracefully to a few civilities and attentions offered by the two barristers, but was evidently not much inclined to any manner of conversation. She exchanged a few words every now and then with her maid, but in the most part remained silent.

It was growing to be late in autumn, and dusk soon began to come on. The evening was soft and beautiful; the face of the country looked tender and poetic, with all its autumn shades and melancholy grace around it.

Our two friends talked together on many subjects, at first in a low tone, then, as the young lady appeared to be asleep, or wholly absorbed in her own thoughts, they began to converse a little more freely and loudly. Something or other, perhaps the great quietness of the evening, set them talking of the old world—of the dear, delightful, tortuning, hair-lifts, blood-chilling pleasures who used to haunt their childhood. They actually began telling each other ghost stories, and did not observe the pale, scared terror of the Cumberland lass, who could hardly sit still in her seat, so great was her interest, excitement, and consternation dread.

"I don't know," said one of the two young men, Leonard Rossmore by name, "why ghosts should be supposed to have necessarily banished ghosts. I can quite imagine a ghost making his appearance in his very train, for instance."

"Can you?" replied Fred Sargent. "I confess I can't; but I think you Northerners, near the Scottish border, have more imagination than we prosaic cockneys."

At the same time he happened to glance at the young lady in the corner, and her pale, sad face seemed ghostlike enough in the dim evening light. Sargent thought for a moment of the legend of the company who sat one evening telling ghost stories until at last the turn came to a pale young lady who had been silent all the time, and who now, when invited to contribute her share to the entertainment, said, in a low, tonseless voice, "I have no ghost story to tell, but I am a ghost myself!" and so vanished.

"Yes," pursued Lewis Rossmore: "I can easily imagine it; and I think it could be done with rather fine effect. Look here, Sargent, take a note of this idea, and make something of it for one of the magazines. Two people are traveling alone in a railway—the express—and have just passed one of the only stoppages—at a little station, which is rushing at full speed across the open country, fifty miles an hour, and the evening is growing dark, like this, they suddenly perceive that one of the seats has an occupant, whose presence was not observed before."

"God's sake don't go on in that way," broke in the Cumberland girl, unable to contain herself and forget her fear. "You might as well mention; it's enough to raise a ghost right i' the midst of us all!"

The two men laughed at first, but the superstitious fear of the poor girl was so obviously genuine and unaffected that Rossmore withdrawn his golden invention, and they reassured her and talked for a few moments of something else. Then the train stopped for five minutes at the one only station where it was to make any halt during the long journey. The two girls out of the compartment in which our friends were, and no one got into it; and when the train had again moved off, the two friends felt secure against further disturbance, they settled themselves for sleep. The young lady appeared to be already asleep.

Both young men slept. Suddenly a loud shriek caused them to start up and rub their eyes.

It was the Cumberland girl who had given the alarm.

"It's a ghost it's a ghost!" she cried. "That's what I've been afeard o' devilry and your talk—you've brought a ghost among us!"

The evening had by this time become complete darkness; the one lamp, the highest luxury in the way of illumination, to which even first-class passengers in an express train could aspire, was burning very dimly; but it needed little light to see that there was a fifth figure in the carriage, the figure of a man. There he was assuredly; a tall, slender man, stooping because of the low arch of the roof, and apparently sitting in the seat, which was vacant, opposite to that on which the young lady was sleeping. He had started up with a half scream on hearing her servant's alarm; but the back of the mysterious intruder was turned to her, and apparently saw nothing surprising in his presence.

Both the young lawyers, however, saw something very startling in it. An English railway train can not possibly be entered by any one after it has moved from the station. It is not in any outer platform, or other means of communication, by which passengers can get from one compartment when it stopped at the station; nobody could have entered it since then; and nobody could have entered it since then; and there was a fifth person where only four were present before.

"Hallo! who are you?" exclaimed Sargent.

"How did you get in—where the devil did you come from?" fiercely demanded Rossmore.

"It's a ghost!" shrieked the Cumberland girl, faithful to her original hypothesis.

"Don't be alarmed, gentlemen," the intruder very calmly observed. "You have not a ghost among you; although, if I had remained under cover a little longer, it is quite possible you might have had a ghost in the carriage before the end of your journey."

But the sound of his voice created a new agitation. The young lady sprung from her seat, and cried out: "Oh, Harold! Harold, dear Harold!" and threw herself upon his neck, and kissed him again and again with fond and unrestrained affection, and such extravagances, to which the intruder lent himself, with great apparent coolness, while the two barristers, aghast, sat with compound interest.

The Cumberland girl said, "God be guid to us—it's Master Harold himself!"

The two barristers resumed their seats, and looked on and listened, but with very different calmness which distinguishes your true British gentleman, or concealed their consciousness. The intruder, whoever he might be, was clearly neither ghost nor robber.

"Oh, Harold!" exclaimed the young lady "how did you come here? Where did you get in—and why have you come at all?"

"Come for! Why, to see you, love, of course. They thought they were quite safe, I believe, when they got me on board ship, but they were a little mistaken. We'll surprise them a little more yet, Alice!"

"But how did you come here, Harold?"

"Do satisfy our curiosity, Sir," Sargent interposed, with a very courteous assumption of part, seeing that your sudden appearance looks very like a fraud upon the railway company, and that I suppose you know you are—and I may be leading directors—and then you are positively accessary of aiding a ghost."

The young man laughed. "Gentlemen," he said, "if you shall have a full explanation. I have only just arrived myself in this country. I have ly her mother, who was a widow, thought fit to marry again, and her new husband, the young lady's step-father—you saw him at the station to-day—detests me, has poisoned his wife's mind against me, and has persuaded her to refuse her consent to our marriage, of which she quite approved two years ago—in the meantime I went to then too young to marry. I am going to the West Indies, and may be absent Heaven knows how long; and they had set their hearts upon preventing me from seeing Alice before I go. Now I had, very naturally, set my heart on seeing her; and yet I didn't care to ask her to do any thing directly in opposition to her mother's commands."

"Quite right, Sir," said Rossmore, with a look of infinite solemnity.

"Very commendable indeed," added Sargent, paternally.

"So, Harold continued, "I found that she was being sent back to the country to-day, in order to get her quickly out of my way—and my reverse was delighted.

"Don't see it yet," murmured Sargent.

"Don't you see?" I came to Euston Station, took a ticket to Liverpool—so you perceive there is no question of fraud on the company—paid a handsome affection to the guard of bribery, and thus induced the guard, first to allow me to hide under the seat, and then to manage so that the young lady whose photograph I showed him, should be conducted into this particular carriage. Gentlemen, this was managed in short, here I am."

"Lucky that you were not smothered," said Sargent.

"Or shot as a robber, on emerging from your hiding-place," said Rossmore.

"Dead flattery, how you must have suffered," Alice whispered. He pressed her hand tenderly.

"Why did you not come out before?" she asked.

Harold smiled. "Blame these gentlemen for that," he said. "They will not be offended if I say that I thought them just a little de trop; and I fancied, from something they said, that you would be out at the station we have just passed, and so I waited. But when I found they were coming further, I felt that it was useless waiting any longer, and I came out, and nearly frightened poor Polly there" (the servant) "out of her senses."

"Very sorry we should have been in your way, Sir," said Rossmore. "But it may interest you to know that I am the very profoundest sleeper who ever traveled in a train, and that I had terribly disturbed your friends."

"And I," said Rossmore, "can hardly keep my eyes open."

So the discreet barristers at once turned round in their seats, coiled themselves up, closed their eyes, and were soon fast asleep in earnest—deep enough for the Emperor Barbarossa or the Sleeping Beauty in a wood of enchanted wood.

Then Harold sat beside Alice, and took her hand in his; and the servant, Polly, seemed to allow the maiden of her legal traveling companions, and sink into sleep. So Alice and Harold talked, and were happy. Harold about to go—uncertainly for years, yet they were happy in the present. Surely that is one of the most delicious and overpowering properties of love—exquisite in its delight and in its pain—that it never looks beyond the present hour, but finds happiness enough in a momentary meeting, though the agony of a long parting threatens next the hand—agony in a momentary parting, although the hope of a speedy reunion may smile and offer consolation.

These two were happy for the hour. But after all the whole journey from London to Liverpool is scarcely more than seven hours; after it and two hours had been wasted before our adventurous lover emerged from his concealment. So the precious Liverpool and separation began to look very threatening and imminent; and Harold, dreading or detesting the thought of such a parting, began to urge a wild proposal. Why should they not escape at Liverpool, take the first boat that was departing—only a very few hours to wait—and go on to Scotland and be married there? Then let the family do its worst; and Harold could not go to the West Indies, but would push a career at home. Or, even if he had to go, the marriage would be a bond and a wedded wife, whom no ill-contingent step-father could take from him. "Be my wife—come and go with me that first; that is all Harold said." So rang the refrain of the passionate outpouring which the young lover Harold kept whispering into Alice's ear.

The girl had spirit enough, and was not unwilling to do it. Indeed, there were few risks life could offer which she was not ready to encounter without looking back to the dreary and odious home life, with Harold far away. Now she was being sent, as she perfectly well knew, to be out of the way, more entirely, of an uncle and aunt in Liverpool, in order that she might be kept out of the way until Harold should have left London and gone out to the West Indies, by where he had relatives, and where he hoped to make a fortune.

"But, Harold dear," the girl whispered, "the thing is impossible. You could not be at the station waiting for me with the carriage. Do you think he would be likely to fail into our plans I'm to be met at the station, you know, by Uncle George—and I know you have—and are very, very quick. Now, you must stop for a minute—let me have a minute to think. Just before we get to Liverpool the train enters a tunnel, and inside the tunnel I know you know you will stop. Listen, and don't be afraid. Just before we get to Liverpool the train enters a tunnel, and inside the tunnel you know you will stop for a minute—you have a minute to make your escape. Now, dear Harold, you must get out; it will be perfectly easy and safe; and Polly shall follow without one instant's delay. Then you hold our breaths, and stand in the darkness close up to the tunnel wall for only a moment, till the train rushes by; and then we get quietly out, take to the road, get a carriage at the nearest inn, and drive to any station on the line, where we can wait for the Scotch mail. Your uncle will only suppose that you have put off coming for a day; he will grumble and wait for to-morrow without doing or even suspecting any thing, and then it will be too late."

"If we are killed—"

"Dearest, do you think I would expose you to any danger?"

"No, Harold, it was not that. I was only going to say that if we are killed—I mean even if we are killed—we shall be killed together!"

Harold embraced his intrepid and desperate fiancée, and the plan was resolved on. A few whispered words conveyed the whole to stout-hearted Polly, who had a romantic heart, and would have gone with these lovers any where—indeed would have done out of an express train flying at full speed rather than desert them. The moment arrived; the tunnel was near; the two young barristers had long since been fast asleep in good reality; Harold softly opened the door, and stood ready to with Alice in his arms; the faithful Polly looked herself with such of her mistress's cloaks and shawls as she could so she could attempt to carry; the train began already to slacken its speed; they were at the mouth of the tunnel; Harold said, in a whisper, "Now, love!" And Alice shut her eyes, and pressed her face against his shoulder.

The train rattled and crashed through the echoing tunnel. The hollow, hideous reverberations aroused our sleeping barristers. Sargent started up, and rubbed his eyes.

"Hallo, Rossmore, this is the Edgehill Tunnel! We shall be in Liverpool in a moment. Shake yourself up, old boy!"

"All right," replied Rossmore, yawning. "Glad we're in. But I say, Sargent, look here —why—did we stop any where?"

"Of course not. Why do you ask?"

"Then where are our fellow-travelers?"

"Good Heavens! To be sure, where are they? I forgot all about them. But they were here—that's certain; and we stopped at no station, and they could not get out."

"Confound it, I never knew any thing like that! Thunder, Harold, where are you, come in mysteriously, and now he has gone out even more mysteriously, and spirited away the two companions with him!"

I say, Rossmore, how if your suggestion of this evening should have turned out a reality! Have we had ghosts in our railway train?"

Both laughed—both were relieved—and the train rushed on, and she crowded, bustling, blazing station at Liverpool. Our friends spoke to the guard, who, from his post of duty, had stared in first to hear of the disappearance of the three passengers; but he seemed to think that, in the case of so distinguished a lyer as Harold, any thing was possible—and then, there was a momentary struggle in the station.

So the barristers made no further inquiries, but took is for granted that all was right somehow, and went on their hotel.

They heard the end of the story, however, even before they arrived in London, for they met Harold Rivers and his young wife in Liverpool ten days after. The pair had just returned from Scotland, where they were married. Their bad, of course, written off at once to Alice's mother, announcing their marriage, and were what a good hope she would soon accept the situation. They could afford to wait a little, for they were grateful and happy; and Harold had made up his mind that he would not go to the West Indies.

PATRIOTIC SONGS OF FRANCE.

THE lasting popularity of the "Marseillaise," now nearly eighty years old, becomes more remarkable when we consider that, although the first song of the Revolution, it was immediately followed by a host of republican effusions, all of which are now in the profoundest favor. There were the "Chant de la Victoire," the "Chant du Retour," the "Chant du Départ," the "Chant de Liberté," the "Chant d'Allons," the "Chant Martial," the "Hymne à la Rose Supreme," the "Chant de Guerre," and "Couplet, revellez-toi," by Gossec. All these, the fruits of a genius unparalleled in its way, and the only lyrical work that, besides the "Marseillaise," has continued to live in the memory of the French is the "Chant du Départ," by Méhul. This was recently sung at one of the Parisian theatres; and the effect of cuirasses, with drawn swords, raised to different voices, it can never become a popular song in the ordinary sense of the word.

One forgotten melody of the old Revolution has been revived within the last few days, however, when the "Histoire des Girondins," by M. De Lamartine, was the book of the day. Gorgeously illustrated and attached to the volume, and condemned to shave their fate, composed, a few hours before his execution, by Vergniaud, who long afterward responded to the state of feeling in 1847, and which, with a slight modification, was sung by the Girondins De Girondins, perhaps, known as "Mourir pour la Patrie." M. Alexandre Dumas, in the "Comte de Monte Cristo," has given a nice piece, terminated with the supper of the Girondists, at which this song was enthusiastically introduced.

The airs of the First Empire were generally of a warlike kind, or, to speak more correctly, the songs were warlike, though often set to the most pacific music. Nothing, for instance, could be more lugubrious than the air written for an opera by Grétry, which was made to fit "Vive Henri Quatre" during the Restoration. The First Empire was by no means badly represented in the world of song by the "Partant pour la Syrie," which, in the days of the Second, has become the most popular tune in England and France; and by the "Sentinelle" of Choron and the "Vaillant Tronbadour" of Sauvan, both of which are to be found in the most common music-books.

The Restoration brought with it the revival of the two famed Bourbon melodies, "Vive Henri Quatre" and "Charmante Gabrielle." A peculiar air, by Grétry, was now made to do duty for several of the restored regime; but this time the music was not diverted from its proper purpose. The words to which it was fitted, "Ou peut-on être mieux qu'au sein de sa famille?" post-on être mieux qu'au sein de sa famille?" number celebrated the blessings of peace than the triumph of a dynasty.

The revolution of 1830 had a song of its own, with which great names were connected, but which, after a short popularity, sunk into utter oblivion. Casimir Delavigne, the poet of the renowned "Messéniennes," was looked upon as the proper person to celebrate the death of July. As he had not even that uncultivated power of music which belonged to Rouget de Lisle, he laid his words to a Hungarian air which he had retained in his memory, and which was duly noted down and scored by Auber. Thus arose the "Parisienne," and to its non-national origin is attributed the short duration of its popularity.

Of late patriotic songs of great merit have been the irrepressible "Marseillaise" and the "Rhin Allemand," which M. Alfred de Musset produced during the consumption of a single cigar, and to which music has been set by M.M. Félicien David and Vaucorbeil. A more successful city, however, is "A la Frontière," with music by M. Gounod, sung at the Opera by M. Devoyod in the uniform of a Zouave.

THE IRON CROSS OF PRUSSIA.

THIS order, which holds the highest rank in Prussia, was instituted in March, 1813, by Frederick WILLIAM III., in honor of the bravery of his deceased wife, Queen LOUISA. Just a year afterward, on the first anniversary of its institution, it was bestowed upon his son, Prince WILLIAM, now King of Prussia, in recognition of a daring action which he first and only won. Its Iron Cross as the proudest decoration on his breast. On the 19th of July of this year, the anniversary of his mother's death, the King decided upon the renewal of the order, with special reference to the war then impending with France. "In view of the serious position of affairs in Germany" (so runs the decree), "and in grateful remembrance of the heroism of our forefathers in the great war of Liberation, I have resolved to revive, in its full significance, the Cross of the Iron Cross, instituted by my revered father."

The new cross, of which we herewith give an engraving, differs from that of 1813–1815 only in the substitution of a W for F W, and in the date. The material is gold, with black enamelling. The black ribbon with a white border indicates service in the field; the white ribbon with a black border, service at home. There are two classes, First and Second, and a large cross, which is to be bestowed for a decisive victory, or for the capture or the successful defence of an important fortress. The cross of the Second class was recently bestowed by the King upon the Crown Prince of Prussia for his victories over MACMAHON.

"PAPA WRANGEL."

"Papa Wrangel"! It may be quite true that this Russian commander of the army of invasion, sent to bring the uproarious Berlin-ers to reason in 1848 or 1849, expressed the grimmest intolerance at that period, as he is declared in his proclamation, "to saw the grass grow in the streets of Berlin," in token of its sad revolutionary condition; it may also be true that he has played something of a comic popular figure ever since in Berlin, and that he never yet got over the difference between the dignity and accuracy of the personal German pen-sion; but one can not help sympathizing deeply with him now. He has outlived his time and age, and, dying though he be in the atmosphere in his capacity of field-marshal, Moltke seems to be able to dispense with his services, for he is only touching to read how he reviewed the other day the regiment of which he is still the nominal chief as it passed Berlin on its way to the Rhine. "I make it known to this whole regiment," he said to the soldiers, "that I have prayed his Majesty the King, in deepest humility, to be permitted to join this war as a common private soldier, upon which request I have received from his Majesty's own hand a most gracious reply, from which I have learned with profound sadness that my respectful prayer had not been accepted." And the tears started to the old man's eyes. He then addressed to his actual successor some martial words, and handed him two prizes—for the first French and English. Finally he seized the regimental standard, and cried, "This sacred banner your fathers have saved at Eylau with their lives from the hands of the enemy, and have always chained victory to its colors; you, my men, will not do otherwise!" He then embraced the commander, handed a photograph of the King, "for whom to fight, win, or die honorably was the most sacred duty," to the sergeant, and shook hands all round, finally overcome with the grief of having to remain behind alone.

THE ENGLISH TEMPLE KNIGHTS.

WHEN Heraclius visited England in 1184 the Templars had removed from their old Precep-tory in Holborn to the New Temple, in Fleet Street, on the site of the present Inner Temple. The venerable archbishop consecrated the new church for them, as well as that belonging to the Hospital of the Knights of St. John at Clerkenwell. The church was dedicated to the Holy Virgin, and built after the model of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. It still remains to remind us of the happiest period in the history of this famous brotherhood.

Around this consecrated building the order raised its new Preceptory, and here they lived for many years according to the rules laid down for them by St. Bernard. Before entering the fraternity, each member had to declare that he had already been a knight, that his sec-ther married nor betrothed, that he had never taken vows in any other order, that he was free from debt, and in sound health. On his admission by the Master of the Temple, each knight made one of the following fraternity vows, as he kneeled brotherhood: "Sir, I am come before God, and before you, to become a brother of the Temple, for the sake of God and our dear Lady to admit me into your society and the good deeds of the order, as one who will be all his life long the servant and slave of the order." After this declaration the Master and brethren kissed the new brother, and clothed and hardship he would have to lead; upon which the candidate bound himself by vows of poverty and sevenations to be obedient to the head of the house and chief head at Jerusalem, to observe the customs of the order, to live in chastity, and to spend all his powers to conquer the Holy Land, and vowed never to be present when a Christian was unjustly and unlawfully despoiled of his heritage. He was then admitted, and assured of "bread and water, and the poor clothing of the Order, and labor and toil enow." The white mantle with the red cross was thrown over him, he received the kiss of peace from the master and the chaplain, and was furnished with the arms and equipments of the order. The ceremony of admission for each Knight Templar. Besides the knights, there were other classes admitted to the order of an inferior degree; but, although inferior, many illustrious and great men were proud to enter them, and among them we find no less a personage than Pope Innocent III. For many years after their foundation in England the members of the order appear to have acted in conformity with the rigorous rules laid down for them; and until the punishment inflicted on those of their members who proved refractory was sufficiently severe. Imprisonment in a small stone chamber built in the thickness of the wall that surrounded the chapel, only four and a half feet in length, and only up in this narrow cell, with hardly food sufficient to support bare existence, they were not allowed the consolations of religion. An aperture was made in the wall, through which the unfortunate prisoner could hear the voices of the brotherhood below, as it chanted the daily service in the chapel. Besides the punishment of imprisonment, offenders were publicly scourged at the bare back by the master before the assembled brotherhood. The flagellation, however, left the delinquent, who, having deserted the order, had returned and sought readmission, was condemned to eat for a year on the ground, and to fast four days in the week on bread and water, and every Sunday to be scourged in the chapel.

Such was the rigorous discipline of the order at the commencement of its career; but prosperity proved a greater enemy to this fraternity than ever adversity had done, and only after the final fall of Jerusalem, the wealth, influence, and power of the order increased, not only in England, but throughout Christendom. At this Preceptory in London, on the spot familiar to every Londoner, kings and emperors were feasted, parliaments and general councils were held. Besides the large gifts bestowed upon the order, vast treasures were deposited in the Temple, and it was considered the safest guardian of wealth and property of all kinds. Here the royal hoard used to be stored within its precincts, but kings sought and found refuge within its walls. Here King John and his queen found shelter when the barons of England demanded and obtained the great charter of their freedom. Here the Duke de Burgh deposited his vast riches when imprisoned in the Tower, and the King in vain sought to obtain them.

In Henry III.'s reign the Master of the Temple first sat in Parliament; but, after the fall of Jerusalem, their power fell. Pride, the sure forerunner of such falls, and vice, the constant attendant on such pride, overshadowed with their baneful influence the bright prospects of this once noble brotherhood. As Spenser tells us, when alluding to the Temple, in the following lines:

"Those brick towers
The which on Thames broad aged backs doe ride,
Where now the studious lawyers have their bowers,
There whilom wont the Temple Knights to bide,
Till they grew to pompous pride;"

The envy of princes is not easily overcome: at least it was not in old days. The pomp monarchs that ruled over the countries of Christendom at the time we are speaking of nar with fear and dismay the increasing power of men who once called themselves "the poor fellow-soldiers of Jesus Christ." They found themselves confronted with a power equal to, if not greater than, their own, and a power that seemed ever on the increase. They coveted the broad acres and vast wealth possessed by the order, and inwardly plotted its fall whenever they were forced to concede to men who were not overscrupulous as to the use they made of them. The common people hated the order with a more bitter hatred, engendered by the scorn and contumely with which they treated by the brotherhood generally, and increased by the vice and depravity of the knights—crimes that remained unpunished and unrestrained. The grand being himself undermined beneath them, it only required a small spark to blow the whole fabric before the fatal day arrived, the Knights Templars, as if determined to end their career in glory, as they had begun it, were more proud of their chivalrous courage by their brilliant defence of Acre. The following history will explain the origin of the movement, and then expired. A few years later, and they had ceased to exist. In 1519, Pope Clement V. and Philip le Bel of France, their two most inveterate enemies, combined together for the total destruction of the brotherhood.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

REVENUE from various quarters indicate that in many sections of the country the peach crop will be "almost a failure." In some places they say there will be difficulty to realize it when at every street corner the incident fruit is piled on stands, and the people seem to be overflowing with peaches and cream. To be sure the season is so much earlier than usual this year that our people have not had the full bent we are wont to have as a great "bee and cry" is so often made as to the "total failure" of the fruit. Still we recommend every body to luxuriate with unrestrained mind in this delicious fruit, as it is so abundant and inexpensive. As one passes through the streets and markets of our city one can see any day, seeing loads of peaches yet hauled, he can not but wonder what becomes of what is left, since much of it is too ripe to keep long. Even the most quantities when the market is overstocked, as it was earlier in the season. The Italian peddlers and fritters of our numerous tenements consume a vast number of baskets, not ripe enough to use as raw ripe to bake, and the cunning of peaches, which, in connection with the canning of tomatoes and corn, has become an immense industry, preserves for our future use hundreds of baskets which would otherwise be wasted.

A Greek Church is soon to be built in New York, according to the Times. The Empress of Russia is interested in the enterprise, and has raised $500 toward the erection of the edifice, which is to be of the Byzantine style of architecture. There is now no Greek Church in the country.

"Grip," the famous raven which belonged to Charles Dickens, is now the property of the London Stereoscopic Company, who have leased his carte. Thus, in a certain sense, all England may be said to be the possessor of this poetic bird, since every body who desires may see the photograph.

Sullivan, Ohio, is the home of a young girl of thirteen, whose father, a thrifty farmer, is very proud of her achievements. For three years past she has had her own choice been engaged in regular farm work, in plowing, sowing, reaping, mowing, and harvesting, as well as in the ordinary household chores. Last summer she raised about forty acres of hay, besides doing her share toward securing and "pitching" it.

The Chinese method of cooking rice, as obtained from the Chinese colony of shoemakers at North Adams, is as follows: Take a stew-pan with a close-fitting top, and a clean piece of white muslin, large enough to cover the pan and hang down inside. Wash the rice nearly to, but not in contact with the bottom. Into the sack so formed place the rice, a pint of water to a quarter of rice, and put on the top of the stew-pan, so as to hold up the muslin bag inside, and fit tight on the pan. Put the pan on a slow fire, and the steam generated from the water will cook the rice. Each grain will be separate, and the rice dry and distinct as if just taken from the boil. More water may be poured into the pan if necessary, but only sufficient to keep up the steam till the rice is cooked.

A Siberian railway is a somewhat novel project, but certain Russian capitalists have undertaken to accomplish it. The proposed line is to be about twelve hundred miles in length, and much of it will be through the forests where ice covered with ice and snow during ten months of the year. It is to commence at Nijni Novgorod, the great market for trade from Northern Asia, Persia, and Turkestan. The value of the goods brought to this market has, during the last ten years, averaged 185,000,000 rubles per annum; but year it was 714,000,000 rubles. Another important object to be reached will be the town of Irbit, at the junction of the Rivers Nizn and Irbita. It is believed that this railway will command the trade of Western Europe, by opening communication with Southern Siberia, whose corn may compete with the best quality.

A correspondent of the Evening Post, writing from Martha's Vineyard, describes the present shifting phase of the Blackmanism mania as "a picturesque little tent, gleaming white and pure in its green frame-work, the flag-staff surmounted by a scarlet bunting." There live John Hutchinson and his wife, showing, as ever, a most dignified aspect to the outer world. Their tent is a great place of resort, and a pleasant party always gathered on the premises.

One must retreat very far from the city nowadays in order to be able to live economically as regards cookery. It surprises a novice to learn the high prices demanded for fruit, meat, milk, and similar commodities in the very section of country where they are produced, and the consequently it is impossible to procure cheap food. A correspondent of the Springfield Republican, who has been vacationing in Massachusetts, was overheard reasoning with a sturdy son of the soil who asked fifty cents a quart for a pailful of young—not old—potatoes, that ran largely to legs. "Why, my friend," said the New Yorker, in persuasive accents, "I am willing to pay just what is charged in Fulton Market, but don't you see that when we come to your door to buy your produce you ought not to charge more than the retail price in New York?" "That sounds well," quoth the farmer; "but we gets all we can, an' if you don't want them young hins at fifty cents a pound other folks do." There was no help for it, and the New Yorker paid the farmer his price, and sent the "young hins" in to the cook.

The country people about Strasbourg say that among the Prussian scouts are a great many persons whom they formerly knew well in different parts of Germany for longer or shorter periods in Alsace. Several of the officers of the army are old acquaintances. One was a pupil in the Ecole d'Application at Metz, another a civil engineer, a third learning the business of a forwarder—all convenient occupations for studying the topography of the district.

Six young women of Charlestown—so the story runs usually challenged all comers to a game of swimming race for the prize of $100. The challenged party accepted, and did not appear on the ground at the appointed time. So the Charlestownites resolved to get up a race among themselves. They started off in fine style; but before they reached the turning stake four gave out, and paddled, exhausted, to the shore. One of the others turned back to see what was the matter, and that she was sinking, and hugging help. Her companion succeeded in keeping her above water until aid arrived. Swimming is a useful and desirable accomplishment for ladies; but such public displays of female strength and skill seem to be neither pleasant nor in good taste.

Bismarck seems to be very friendly to American journalists, according to an account of an interview with him given by a correspondent of the World, written from St. Avold. He says:

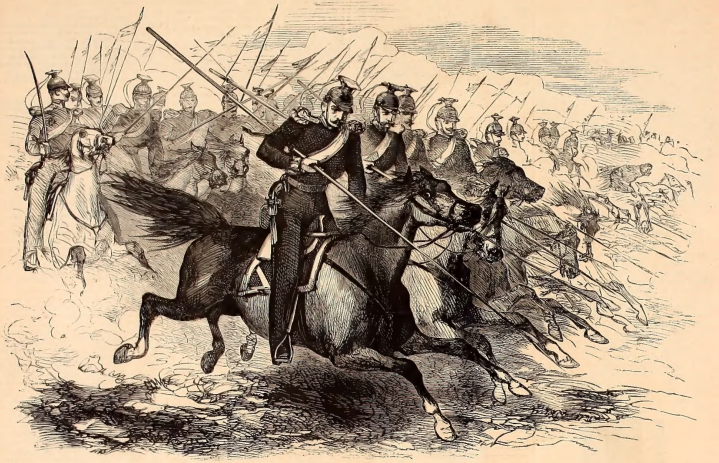
"While I was looking at the duty there passed by me a great group of men, several hundred in all, who, as I judged, had powerfully built. I knew it was Bismarck, for the others stood in two lines to salute him as he passed the street. Among all the soldiers he was by black the most striking figure. Tall, lordly myself and an American, I can assure you whose company I should be in. Seeing me, the Chancellor—he was in simple dark blue civilian dress—came up to me and said, with a slight forgive to step on past us, after taking a good look at him, we were introduced. We approached him, and he met us half-way. 'Where are you from?' he asked. I told him. 'Ah, you have been in Paris? Have the Prussians not been in that country.' He then said: 'You are welcome, sir, to the army. We have advertisements in America, and with our army.' The only thing that he seemed to be afraid of was that the French army would be prepared against the Prussian movement. He said that he anticipated the freedom of every thing will be accorded to the press. 'The only thing we can not permit is the importation forward. You see we are very much crowded, and with a view to keeping us secret. You will have, gentlemen, to depend upon yourselves for news. Step forward.' I did every thing. For all the help and protection you require, you have only to come to me.' I thanked him."

Boston is shocked by the recent announcement that there is a Mormon Church in that city. However, the society is small, there being only seven members, and, moreover, they are not Mormons after Brigham Young's fashion. The society itself the "Reorganized Church of the Latter Day Saints."

A new epidemic among horses, cattle, and pigs has been creating a sensation in the western part of Canada. The disease is described as commencing its appearance in a number of small blotches or gathering of the throat and feet of the pigs, thence overleg spread, loosening the flesh and the bone and swelling to an enormous size. Behind the shoulders the skin cracks horizontally, the part soon begins to bleed, and the animal gives partial relief. Meanwhile the swelling extends to the breast. Sometimes this breaks out in monstrous boils or ulcers, and the pig dies in a more unusual manner, a complete putrefaction of all your family. What is your husband's name, madam? Sullivan, Ohio, and gives the pig the pail of a shirt, she answers, "Mother O'Sullivan." What is your husband's name, my dear?" Jeremiah Grubb, as she says," And where does you know? I wasn't at his christening." "Good" morning, madam," he continues, blandly. "When you speak to him love do you address him?" "Father big at the shirt." "Sir, or, is Mister O'Sullivan; and fags, if I knew his christen name, I wouldn't thanks him so disrespectfully as to call him Pat." "Did you ever hear your self so him by a Christian name?" "Aw, yis!" "Well, what is your self?" "Aw, yis!" And another footful pail at the washing, and out comes this answer, "I am your husband." Mem call him Mister Grubb Hunter, and more call him Michael." For five minutes the patient litigator continued to question and receive the following answers. Finally, the straightens up, wipes the suds with her hands off her apron, and says: "Now, I'll tell you what you must I'ver saw. Store I've been thering to git to and the last five minutes, and the last five minutes you pilfage the name of your self, I'm growing, and I'll tell you say thing ye want to know." So she continued quietly, and the lawyer calls out at the bottom of the stairs, "Mistress Mahoney." Come down here." Here's a gentleman taking the United States clients. He wants to know the names of all your family. Just give it to him, and then show him out the rist of the folks trough the building."

For ten years past a dog in Cincinnati has lived a hermit life. His cell is under an old house, and he is never seen except in the darkness. There he is perfectly quiet, and never barks. At night he steals out from his retreat and takes a ramble, apparently in search of food. He seeks no companions, and why he has thus retired from the world is a mystery.

As exchange asserts that it is useless to assassinate flies, for, unless you annihilate them, they come to life again. In proof of this it remarks that Franklin found some dead flies drowned in a bottle of wine that had been corked up for many years, and when he exposed them to the sunshine they soon flew about as lively as ever!



A GROUP OF PRUSSIAN UHLANS.

THE UHLANS.

THE Uhlans, who have been lately seen within twenty-five miles of Paris, are light cavalry, armed with breech-loading carbines and lances, who are much employed by the Prussian commanders as scouts. They push far into the enemy's country, and are of immense service in procuring intelligence of movements in progress, the position of the enemy, and in keeping up a state of terror and uncertainty throughout the country. It will be remembered that, during the late war in the South, our cavalry were often similarly employed in "raiding" within the enemy's lines with the same general purpose and results.

THE FORTIFICATIONS OF PARIS.—[SEE PAGE 605.]

PEASANTS FLYING.

ONE of the saddest features of the war is the desolation that marks its progress through a land. The carnage of the battle-field is not its worst evil. Wherever it sweeps it leaves the record of its devastating trend in ruined highways, desolated fields and farm-houses, and silent hamlets. The illustration on this page, which represents a party of French peasantry flying to some place of refuge before the approach of the enemy, is but one out of a thousand incidents that show how heavily the woes and burdens of the war have fallen upon the peaceful homes of France.

THE FORTIFICATIONS OF PARIS.

THE fortifications about the French capital, of which we give an accurate plan on page 604, are of that peculiar denomination known to military engineers as a "continuous enceinte," and a "surrounding girdle of exterior forts." The inner line, as may be seen by the plan, consists of a series of bastions, presenting nearly a hundred angular fronts. It entirely surrounds the city, and is said to be the longest continuous line of bastions in the world, being twenty-two miles in circuit. In front of these bastions is a continued fosse, or moat, eighteen feet deep and twenty wide, which can be filled with water from the Seine, if required for the defense of the city. Around the whole circuit runs a magnificent military road, to facilitate the concentration of artillery or infantry with the least possible loss of time at any given point; and from the enceinte to the several exterior forts, as also between the forts, are likewise these same excellent roads. Outside the enceinte, detached from it, and situated at the distance of from a mile and a quarter to two miles from the enceinte, and the same distance from each other, are the forts forming the outer girdle. The cheapest of these forts cost $700,000, exclusive of the purchase-money for the site. Fort Mont Valerien cost about $1,000,000, and Fort De Charenton $800,000. Until the present war broke out there was not a gun mounted upon the ramparts, nor was the enceinte complete. Under the vigorous administration of General Trochu the armament has been fully completed, and the entire inner works put in a state of preparation to repulse the enemy. According to the latest reports nearly two thousand guns have been placed in position on the bastions. About one hundred gates pierce the ramparts, the fosse being crossed by draw-bridges which can be removed at a moment's notice, or, if necessary, destroyed by the cannon on the walls.

The object of this method of fortification—that of an enceinte and detached forts beyond—is to have not only two lines of defense, but two such lines as would furnish a powerful fortress all around the city, and at the same time debar an enemy from getting near enough to that fortress to shell the city. The forts prevent the erection of a siege line against the city, and in case an assault were made between the forts to take the city by storm, the enceinte, with its ninety-four bastions, is there to protect it. An army surrounding Paris within cannon range of the girdle of forts would not occupy less than ten leagues. Thirteen years ago the best engineers pronounced the fortifications of Paris impregnable, and since 1857 millions upon millions have been lavished in bringing these works to the highest possible point of efficiency.

the circuit of bastions, shown in our plan, indicates the position of the old walls of Paris, which have long since given place to magnificent boulevards. The space between the old boundaries of the city and the new walls is now closely built up; but the most important public edifices are within the limits of the old Paris, where they would be comparatively safe from the effects of a distant bombardment.

A CHECKERED LIFE.

STEFAN TURR, the emissary of Bismarck and Napoleon, seems to have led rather a checkered life. He is the son of a shoemaker, and was born in Baja, in Hungary, in 1825. He at first was "inserted" into the Austrian army, advanced after some time to a corporalship, and in 1848 sent with the Imperial Regiment of Infantry, Archduke Francis Charles, to Italy. He had been proposed for a lieutenantship, when, with some of the men, he deserted over the bridge near Buffalo to the Sardinians. There he was made colonel of the newly formed Bersaglieri Legion, the so-called Capriuns. When, after the battle of Novara, Austria particularly demanded the having Turr given up, he escaped into Switzerland, whence he went to Baden, and there joined Mieroslawski. He now reorganized as lieutenant-colonel, and Mieroslawski promoted him to a field-marshal's office. The difficult office in the Duchy of Baden to smuggle to Switzerland with one hundred and three men, whom he despatched to America, himself remaining behind. In the next sent to Constantinople, and during the Crimean war obtained British naturalization, and went as British agent to Bucharest. There, on neutral ground, he was arrested by the Austrians as a deserter, sent home and brought before a court-martial at Karlsburg, in Transylvania. Almost on the eve of being led out to execution the judge confided to him that Queen Victoria had interfered on his behalf, as a naturalized British subject, and that the Emperor had in consequence commuted his sentence to eternal banishment from the Austrian states. In 1859 he joined Garibaldi, became commander of the Chasseurs, received a wound, and was promoted to a generalship. Since 1861 he has equivocated chiefly in Paris, being now one of the most intimate friends of Prince Napoleon; and in September, 1861, married Adelina Wyse-Bonaparte, second daughter of Princess Letitia Bonaparte, sister of Pierre Napoleon, and nominal secretary of the English Consul Wyse, but born in 1842, long after Wyse's legal separation from his wife. The first legitimate daughter of Wyse is the wife of RATTAZZI, the Princess solms.

OLD EYGPT.

GREAT and splendid as are the things which we know about oldest Egypt, she is nothing to us and times more sublime by our uncertainty as to the limits of her accomplishments. She presents not a great definite idea, which, literally to receive, is, when once acquired, comprehensible and clear. Under the soil of the modern country are laid away thousands and thousands of relics which may astonish the world for ages to come, and change continually the conception of what Egypt was. The effect of research seems to be to prove the objects of it to be much older than we think them to be; and nothing is thought to be wholly modern having been proved to be repetitions of things Egyptian, and what was once known to have been Egyptian being by every advance in knowledge carried back more and more toward the very beginning of things. The shades our most rooted ideas concerning the world's history. She has not existed for a people and a lure: there is a spell over her still.

Besides her early maturity and the solitariness of her career, there is another mystery surrounding Egypt; and that is the thick darkness that so long shut her out from sight. We are wont to call those ages dark wherein the wisdom of Greece and of Rome became dim to the world at large, and was treasured by that of the East; what was this darkness in comparison of the utter obscurity which settled with a pall of existence over Egypt herself, over all her wisdom and all her works? As year by year the deposit of the river was enlarging her mountain mounds, so was the cloud of oblivion enveloping and surely obliterating the memory of her glory and her ability; and this in spite of the most determined resistance that any nation has ever offered to time and his effacing power. Her monuments would not, could not perish forever; but they were ineffectual to avert an eclipse that lasted he ages. It is little less than a miracle that such a country could quietly sink out of sight, and the world begin life again, knowing that there was originating thought and art, while close to the tyros lay a nation that had proved itself before every mode of human ability, and whose credentials did not rest on tradition or history, but were shining on the earth—splendid, gigantic, palpable —obvious to the regard of the aspiring and the indifferent. As we ponders on these things it is impossible to be regardless of the denunciation of the Hebrew prophet (Ezekiel) who foretold this obscurity. "The pomp of her strength shall cease in her: as for her, a cloud shall cover her, and her daughters shall go into captivity." The period of forty years during which no foot of man or foot of beast was to pass through Egypt is not plain, but the condition to which Egypt fell is only too distinctly painted. "I will make the land of Egypt desolate in the midst of the countries that are desolate, and her cities among the cities that are laid waste shall be desolate forty years: and I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations, and will disperse them through the countries." The "cloud," we may suppose, began to break at the beginning of this century; from without came the regard of nations, from within more reasonable and the desire to be known once more. The nations of the world resort thither again, and find this kingdom truly "a base kingdom," but things looked as though she had resolved to acquiesce no longer in her base estate. Already one sees how the highway from Egypt to Assyria, foretold by the prophet Isaiah, may be accomplished. The breach of the Isthmus will undoubtedly lead to the contraction of the desert, so that the way into Assyria will be comparatively easy. And with it will vigor and civilization shall return, what great result may not the opening of the canal bring! To a nation waking up to consciousness after centuries of coma every thing about her present self must be unsatisfactory and distasteful—a condition to be reformed as soon as possible, and banished from sight and memory. Her reformatory thoughts all centre in the past. As she looks back with pride and glory at what she was, the only help she has to aspire to is by veiling her, and she can feel a trust in herself. Her rising hopes and aims will find the antiquity full of old, and her sons will gain strength from the knowledge of the glorious dead. When this spirit shall animate Egypt—when, instead of having research to the stronger that may come from a far land, Egyptian theorists shall arise for it, Egyptian labor to ascertain the wonderful past of their native country—then, perhaps, the world will truly understand what is meant by Old Eygptians was.

For him who believes that his puny efforts are tending to the establishment of a golden age, and leading the human race to perfection, there can be no corrective more effectual than the study of ancient Egypt. From thence he may learn the truth that human wisdom and human knowledge can not perpetuate themselves. Great, strong, wise as she was, the glory of Egypt came to nought, her sciences perished, her mysteries became riddles. Progress was arrested, and thick darkness overspread the earth—not for a short interval, but during a very large portion of the world's existence—darkness which has never yet been dispersed. It is true that, if we can not build pyramids or hew out colossal statues, or divert the course of a river like the Nile, we can use the printing-press, and control the forces of electricity and steam. But, when we have summed up gains and losses, what is the amount of advancement since the days of Moses that we can fairly credit ourselves with? Truly it is very little, and that little has not been gained in the last two or three centuries.

But if we, overcome whose life is half an age, may not influence the destinies of the world on which we live, or of our remote successors, that consideration need not damp our ardor in the study of the past. We may not be able to build a tower whose top shall reach to heaven. Plenty of legitimate work is given us to do; we are commanded to subdue the earth, but we are not commissioned to determine its form. That future will not be affected, probably, by our acts and labors as our present has been by the wisdom and works of the Egyptians, is not matter—a community of great nations—any die like a mighty man, and then all their thoughts perish. We are not to be overwhelmed, but we have a field for labor—greater labor than we shall ever accomplish. Let us benefit, if we may, our own generation and that which is to follow us, trusting to the providence of an ever-living Power to determine whether any part of our work shall survive and be a heritage for our descendants; or whether it shall perish utterly; or whether, like the glorious deeds of old Egypt, it shall lie for millenniums under a mysterious cloud, and five again before to a race which as it has not entered into our hearts to conceive.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

"MY Wheeler & Wilson Machine has been in use nearly eleven years without any repairs. Five and a half years ago I set a No. 1½ needle, which has not been changed since. The machine has been used by as many as seven or eight different persons during that time, and has made dresses, skirts, boys' jackets, coats, pants, vests, and hemmed cotton cloth, linen, Nansook and Swiss muslin, without either tucker or hemmer."—MRS. A few nights ago a light in a small window, while sewing, upset a lighted lamp filled with fluid. The lamp fell, breaking the chimney, and precipitating the contents, together with the wick, which was all burning, into the bag. He picked up the wick and extinguished it, without igniting the oil or causing any damage whatever. This saved the bag from being filled with ashes, as the Astral Oil is the best and safest illuminating oil. Had the lamp been filled with kerosene, she would probably have paid the penalty with her life.

The oil is for sale by all responsible dealers, and at wholesale and retail by the Oil House of CHAS. PRATT, 108 FULTON ST., N. Y.—[COM.]

SOMETHING GRAND.

The Annual Shakespearian Almanac for 1871 is now out. Three Million copies of this Almanac will be given away, and in order that the distribution may be made as rapidly as possible, I should deem it a favor if you would send for a few copies, and distribute them with judicious discretion there in his Society. One of its main features is the Parley or Courtship between Richard the Third and Queen Anne. This portrays, as nothing else can, man's villainy and woman's weakness. The illustrations fully talk. Miss Van Kortland.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"MY DAUGHTER ELINOR."

8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

From "Miss Van Kortland." we rose, as a year ago from "My Daughter Elinor," with the feeling of having had a great deal for our money. Whoever the author of these volumes is, we can but echo the hope of a young lady who finished her first book just on the edge of a long summer day, striking her eyes in the dark to read the last words: "Well, I'd like to shut my eyes with a pen and paper, and keep writing all the time." There are bubbles of wit that remind you of Dickens; there are situations, both tragic and comic, which move you now to laughter and then to tears; there are bits of eloquent description that keep your attention captive; and, above all, there is heroism while womanly denunciation of some popular sins.—Independent.

Harper's Magazine.

The Forty-first Volume of the Magazine closes with the November No. Its success hitherto—unrivaled by that of any other periodical in England or America—has been due to the popular character and variety of its contents, to the enterprise of the Publishers in securing for its pages, at any cost, contributions from the most eminent and popular writers; to its profusely illustrated articles of literature and description; to the promptness, authenticity, and popular character of its news pages upon current topics; to the mechanical improvements of the age, and upon every point which has tended to enjoy and interest the special Editorial Departments—to which recently a new one has been added, viz., the Drawer Scientific Record. The elements upon which the past success of HARPER'S MAGAZINE rested will still continue to be its leading characteristics; and its Publishers are confident that they will be rewarded by a still wider favor as the reading public they will be able to measure ever more highly its merits.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains over fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any similar periodical issued in this country. The enterprise of the Publishers in the disposal of its Publishers will enable them to treat fully all the important topics of the day.

AIR TARGET PISTOL.

There is a peculiar fascination in all amusements that require skill of hand, eye, and judgement, which entirely distinguishes them from games of chance. The latter soon pall upon the taste without the zest given to them by stakes. The former, the more they are indulged in the more they delight, because with increasing skill there is an increasing sense of acquired power, which always comes from discipline.

There in all the difference between these two classes of amusements that exists between health and disease, between moral purity and moral depravity. Hence those who have made moral science a study have been unanimous in recommending games of skill, and just as unanimously in denouncing games of chance.

Among all the recreations which demand skill, perhaps none present more attractions to the majority of mankind than shooting with the rifle, pistol, or fowling-piece, which develop the eye and nerves to steadiness and precision.

At pleasure resorts and watering-places air-gun practice has become a standard amusement with both sexes.

Air pistols and guns have heretofore been somewhat expensive, costing from twenty dollars to sixty dollars, according to style and finish. The pistol herewith illustrated costs only three and a half dollars, and is, we believe, the cheapest air pistol ever constructed.

The stock or handle is of japanned iron, the barrels are of brass. The lower barrel is the air pump, by which the stock is filled with condensed air.

The dart or bullet is put into the breech end of the upper barrel, through an aperture shown in the engraving, and the aperture is then closed by a vine slide.

The hammer of the lock strikes on a spring which compresses it still and opens a valve leading from the air chamber to the upper barrel, and allows just sufficient air to escape for a charge. It will shoot from five to ten shots a distance ranging from thirty to fifty feet at one charging.

Darts are furnished with each pistol, and every piece is tested before leaving the factory. H. HAWKES, Rome 1, 1869. For pistols, address

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 717.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE SURRENDER AT SEDAN.

ABOUT five o'clock on the evening of September 1 there was a sudden suspension of the cannonade along the Prussian lines; and a few minutes later a French officer, escorted by two Uhlans, advanced up the steep bridle-path leading from Sedan, carrying a white duster on a stick as a flag of truce. The messenger turned out to be a French colonel, come to ask for terms of surrender. After a very short consultation between the King and General VON MOLTKE, the messenger was told by the General that, in a matter so important as the surrender of at least 80,000 men and an important fortress, it was necessary to send an officer of high rank. "You are therefore," said the General, "to return to Sedan and tell the governor of the town to report himself immediately to the King of Prussia. If he does not arrive within an hour our guns will again open fire. You may tell the commandant that there is no use of his trying to obtain any other terms than unconditional surrender." The officer returned with this message, and about an hour later the French General REILLY rode up with a letter for the King. As soon as the French general was in sight the escort of cuirassiers and dragoons was drawn up in line, two deep. Behind the King, in front of the escort, was the staff; and ten yards in front of them again stood his Majesty, King WILLIAM of Prussia, ready to receive General REILLY.

GENERAL REILLY BEARING THE SURRENDER OF THE FRENCH ARMY AT SEDAN TO KING WILLIAM.

That officer was the bearer of an autograph letter from the Emperor NAPOLEON to King WILLIAM. The Emperor wrote: "As I can not die at the head of my army, I lay my sword at the feet of your Majesty."

On the receipt of this letter there was a brief consultation between the King, the Crown Prince (who had come over from his hill on the arrival of the flag of truce), Count BISMARCK, General VON MOLTKE, and General VON ROON. After a few minutes' conversation the King sat down on a rush-bottomed chair, and wrote on the another chair held as a table by two aids-de-camp) to the Emperor, asking him to appoint a meeting for the King of Prussia's head-quarters, at Vendresse.

The next day the Emperor sought an interview with Count BISMARCK, which took place a few hundred yards outside the squalid walls of the village of Donchery, near Sedan. The humble cottage of a poor weaver stood near the place, and Count BISMARCK led the way and entered it. The room was not pleasant, and the Count walked up the stairs. The apartment was filled by the hand-loom and appliances of the weaver; so he descended, and found the Emperor sitting on a stone outside. Two chairs were brought out of the cottage. The Emperor sat down in one; Count BISMARCK took the other, and placed it on his Majesty's left-hand side. The officers in attendance on their fallen master lay down, some distance away, upon a small piece of grass in front of the cottage. The conversation was a strange one. The great point to be gained was peace; but no assurance of it could be obtained by Count BISMARCK. The Emperor stated that he had no power; could not accept an armistice; could not give orders to the army or Marshal BAZAINE. The Empress was Regent of France, and on her and her Ministers must devolve the negotiations. So Count BISMARCK thereupon remarked that it was of no avail to have further conversation on political matters with his Majesty, and that it would be of no use to see the King. The Emperor declared to see the King in person, but Count BISMARCK declared it was not possible to accede to his Majesty's wishes until the capitulation had been signed. Then, as the conversation was becoming rather dangerous, and as the situation was becoming difficult on both sides, they ended it. The interview terminated. Count BISMARCK went to see the King; the Emperor withdrew to consult his officers.

At half past eleven the following terms were agreed upon between General WIMPFFEN and General MOLTKE: "The garrison and army of Sedan to surrender as prisoners of war, to be sent into Germany; officers to be liberated on parole not to serve again during the war; all horses, guns, and munitions of war to be given up."

About two o'clock the King, with his body-guard and staff, and numerous attendants, with the Crown Prince and staff of general officers, proceeded to a chateau outside Sedan, and received the Emperor. He came with his personal followers and staff, in charge of an escort, which was ranged on the other side of the road facing the chateau. The King and his captive retired into the glass house off one of the principal rooms on the ground floor, and they could be seen by the staff outside engaged in earnest dialogue. After the interview with the King the Emperor had a few moments' conversation with the Crown Prince, during which he was much agitated when alluding to the manner of the King.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1870.

THE NEW YORK REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

THE action of the New York Republican Convention apparently satisfied every body but the Democrats. This is the most surprising because the Democratic party in the State, in its two great branches of the SWEENY and the TILDEN Democracy, is such a unity of hostility that it should surely not grudge a little harmony to the Republicans. There were, undoubtedly, serious differences and warm feeling at the Saratoga Convention, but there was no discord; and the Democratic papers are therefore reduced to the old shift of willful misuse and misrepresentation. The question of general sympathy with the Administration was tested at the opening of the Convention, and conclusively settled; and the resolutions adopted with unanimity are not wanting in decisive cleanness.

That the Convention did not prefer MR. GREELEY as a candidate for Governor is probably not surprising to so experienced a politician. He knows that a man who has been for a generation the editor of a leading party journal, and who concerns no opinions, is the last degree that he has written himself into fame has written himself out of availability as a party candidate. He knows that the story of a profound question it may indulge its sense of respect and gratitude; but when the contest is sharp and close it will remember too much of the various hostility which so long a career of such a kind has necessarily occasioned.

The condition of the party and the certainty of a contest inclined the Convention to some man who might be considered free from such disabilities, and whose character and fair fame would commend him to the unqualified sympathy and support of the party. MR. FENTON is a candidate one of the largest, and undoubtedly one of the weightiest, conventions ever assembled in the State believed it had found in General WOODFORD, whom it called by a very great majority to bear its banner in the campaign—a majority which became immediately the whole Convention. With General WOODFORD is associated MR. KAUFMAN as Lieutenant-Governor. The objection, which is really not important, that he is from the same part of the State with Governor HOFFMAN, was considered by the consideration that he was nominated by the Erie delegation. MR. PALMER, for Comptroller, is by common consent one of the best nominations that could be made by any party.

The World received the nomination of General WOODFORD with a sneer. The Democratic his opponent, Governor HOFFMAN, as a "statesman." But if epithets were arguments General WOODFORD would never have been elected President. Even the exquisite humor of the World in calling him "HIRAM," throughout the campaign of 1868, did not defeat him. Let us compare the claims of these two gentlemen upon the confidence of the honest voters of New York. The one is a young man, who both lawyers by profession. MR. WOODFORD is called an unknown lawyer. But although MR. HOFFMAN was Recorder, we never heard that he was of any distinction in his profession. During the war MR. HOFFMAN was of Copperhead sympathies. In 1864 he was made a delegated Unionist. MR. HOFFMAN's very proper course of official duty led him to sentence the convicted colonel of the 7th to severe punishment. MR. WOODFORD's sense of public duty led him to leave his profession, and raise a regiment, and go himself into the field. In consequence of MR. HOFFMAN's sentence of the sisters his party, compelled as the end of the war to nominate a candidate, found it some apparent claim upon the support of honest citizens, made MR. HOFFMAN Mayor. So, in consequence of the sentence of the colonel of the party in which he had been so faithful and efficient a worker, GENERAL WOODFORD was made lieutenant-Governor.

As Lieutenant-Governor of the State he discharged all the duties of his office with universal approval. And when, at the end, HOFFMAN's single remarkable act was his proclamation, just before the election of 1868, virtually denying the frauds which were notorious to every body actively concerned in politics—frauds which the editor of the World declared to be within the knowledge of every intelligent man—the World declared to be within the knowledge of every intelligent man—frauds which made MR. HOFFMAN Governor. MR. WOODFORD left office to return to his profession. MR. HOFFMAN left it to become, from the routine duties of his position, a chiefly remarkable for his obedient signing of the Erie Bill, one of the most disgraceful measures in official authority in our history—an act done for the advantage of political intrigues whose names are familiar to the State and the country.

The World calls MR. HOFFMAN "a statesman," and assumes a General Committee. The voters of New York will consider the career of the two gentlemen, and decide between their claims upon their confidence and support of honest and intelligent men. It is perfectly well known who is in power when MR. HOFFMAN appears to be Governor. It is equally well known that MR. WOODFORD is no man's instrument, and represents that better tendency in our politics which can certainly not be developed by the Democratic party. The contest will inevitably be close; but with the Congressional law to regulate the ballot-box, and the profound conviction that the promises of the Democratic party are as worthless as rebel currency, with the general feeling that Democratic ascendency would be fatal to the true welfare of the country, with a long, strong, and unanimous Republican poll, the State of New York may be rescued and restored to its old political fidelity.

GERMANY AND ENGLAND.

IT is to be regretted that the attitude of Great Britain—which "America," a learned correspondent of the Evening Post, calls the representative of all the Anglo-Saxon race—apparently displeases Germany, and there has been report of a very crisp Prussian demand upon the British Government in respect to neutral obligations. The complaint of Prussia is our old complaint, that Great Britain does not sufficiently enforce those obligations. As to the particular offense charged, the circular of Earl GRANVILLE, the British Foreign Minister, says only that different persons entertain different views at different times of what is contraband of war, and there are no general decisions. And it does not appear that Great Britain has contraband to neutral ports, and it is too much to ask that neutrals shall do the work of belligerents.

Great Britain is not accused of furnishing arms or ammunition to France to the prejudice of Germany, nor of violating any treaty obligation, but stress is laid by Prussia upon the fact that coal has been in the declaration of the cargo, which must be decided by the belligerent prize court, and not by the British Government. Earl GRANVILLE, in a wholly frank and manly way, states the recent exportation from Great Britain of objects that might be denounced as contraband in proof of the equity of British action.

But the eager haste with which, as we stated last week, Parliament has amended the British neutrality laws are an anxious wish not to be longer wanting in honorable neutrality, even if it does not betray a slight doubt that there may have been some offense. The action of Parliament is a sign of friendship which Prussia can not refuse to acknowledge and accept. It is the hope in the British law had been made upon our complaint during the rebellion in this country, our national feeling toward Great Britain would have been very different from that which exists. Nor can we doubt that the same sagacity which dictated the circular of Earl GRANVILLE, and which, at the instance of the Government, has amended the neutrality law, will perceive the justice and propriety of an expression of regret to the United States, accompanied with an offer of a settlement of the Alabama claims.

It is easy to say, and to believe, that the action of Great Britain is the result of fear; that in our case she supposed we were to be defeated, and therefore did not care to prejudice the conqueror, while she is now quite sure that Germany will be the victor, and so drops an anchor to windward. But this view is unquestionably party true. But it is still possible to believe that statesmanship is not solely inspired by the meanest and most selfish views, and may sometimes rise to the perception of the policy of international friendship. Every unprejudiced American must believe that Great Britain would not have acted unwisely for herself, would neither have injured her prestige nor her power, if she had been willing, by amending her neutrality law, to show a friendly wish to respect her neutral obligations toward us. Nations are driven to the sympathy of other nations, as well as in their own power, as Germany feels at this moment. It is a truth to which we do not doubt that MR. GLADSTONE and Earl GRANVILLE are blind.

Meanwhile a good understanding between Great Britain and Germany is most desirable for every reason. Civilization could no more gain by a war between those powers than by a war between United States and Great Britain. That we have suffered by British feeling and conduct during our war is no reason that we should wish that Great Britain is troubled; for the misfortune of England could not be the advantage of America. To spite a neighbor is a puny proof of power or hostility, but it is not a promising method of promoting the harmony or the welfare of neighborhoods. There is no man in his senses who does not wish that the differences between the United States and Great Britain may be amicably adjusted; and, for similar reasons, the relations of friendship between Germany and England may not be disturbed. The power and influence of the press to this result are considerable, and to treat pending questions in a tone of flippancy or bitterness is to assume the gravest responsibility.

THE RIGHTS OF MINORITIES.

THE late Convention at Reading, in Pennsylvania, to consider the minority system of representation is a significant sign of political progress. Illinois has just constitutionally provided for the election of the minority in the election of members of the Legislature and of the managers of all incorporated companies in the State, and the Pennsylvania Convention suggests to the next Legislature of that State the adoption of a similar system for the election of various officers. It is not for a Constitutional Convention to embody this and other provisions in the fundamental law. The proper action in the premises is that, in a community of two thousand voters, the views of nine hundred and ninety-nine shall not be called down by a majority of one, but shall have positive and authorized expression.

The opponents of the scheme say, indeed, that practically in the case supposed the representative does not disregard the opinions of the large minority; that not only his general feeling naturally tempers his action, which is all that a minority can fairly expect. But, although this seems reasonable enough, the fact is the case opinions of the minority do not in the least affect the representative's vote, and the minority is perpetually unrepresented.

Again, it is said by the opponents of the system that it would lead to the representation of special interests and classes, while it is desirable that the general interest should control legislation; and that the general interest is best expressed by the majority. But this is only a plausible objection. For, in fact, nine hundred and ninety-nine persons do not represent a special interest any more than a thousand and one persons do. In both cases the numbers represent those who agree upon a policy which is best for the general interest. Probably all intelligent people would admit that a representation of special interests would be very undesirable and surely fatal to wise legislation. Indeed, the very basis of much of our present legislation is that it is dictated by certain special interests. The representative is hopelessly entangled by the commitment he pays to him: "Sir, the bellowsmakers are protected, and I demand equal protection for the makers of bellows." Certainly! There is no consistent reply to such an argument; the member must vote for the demand. But deliberately to recognize and organize such a system, to have a Congress of representatives of bellows-makers and fine-tooth combs, would be very much more inconvenient than the present system.

The obvious advantage offered by the minority representation is that it gives to the Legislature the relative weight of numbers and opinion that actually exists in the country. If it be said that in critical emergencies this is not advisable, because great unanimity of sentiment and action is then often indispensable, and that it could not be expected in an exact representation of differing opinions, it must, on the other hand, be remembered that when great emergencies arise, as now in France, there is usually unanimity in the Legislature, and that one of the advantages of minority representation is that it diminishes the perpetuity of such an emergency. If the anti-slavery sentiment of the country had been proportionately represented in Congress, the violent secession of the Cotton States, and Pennsylvania, has been one of the most earnest advocates of the reform; and he very truly says that it is in no sense a partisan, but a truly patriotic movement.

THE DEMOCRATS AND THE WAR.

AN influential Western German paper, the Anzeiger des Westens, published at St. Louis, calls attention to the striking fact that, with few significant exceptions, "the entire Democratic press in America has taken side in the present war with France." And it adds, that "the insults which the Democratic papers now heap upon the Germans strike deep, and will not be forgotten." But the fact could be no surprise to one who is familiar with the Democratic press. It is always upon the side which surprises the Anzeiger. The most outrageous criticisms of JOHN BRIGHT, and other European liberals, that have appeared in the United States, have been those of Democratic papers; and Democratic papers also have steadily sung the praises of LOUIS NAPOLEON and CESARISM. By all kinds of innuendoes and implications against those who were conspicuously opposed to him, by exculpations of his worst acts and by making the most of the less nefarious, the insolence of that press has been generally thrown in favor of the Napoleonic empire.

Naturally, therefore, since the war began the Democratic press has vehemently favored the Emperor. We do not recall one hearty protest in any Democratic paper against the utterly inhuman conduct of LOUIS NAPOLEON, which has brought such calamities upon the French people and upon Europe. That the war is any thing more than a trial of strength between two armies it seems not to be able to perceive. When LOUIS NAPOLEON came put forth his fatal proclamation, its criticism was that he managed his case skillfully, and the events daily reported have confirmed as unfavorably for Germany as they possibly can be. The attempts of the Democratic papers to excuse this position of affairs by blaming Germans in the war, and through them to European liberal progress, are as comical as they are futile. But the ludicrous effort to excuse does not show an unexpectedness of having blundered. It does not in the least disclose any perception of the fact that the cause of liberal progress and justice has, as much for France as for itself. Indeed, the sincerity of fine words, extorted only by fears of political loss at home, and which are contradicted by the uniform tone of the papers that now use them, is not very impressive. Papers that have for years praised LOUIS NAPOLEON, and remember to say a few phrases about the people of Europe only when he is humbled, are not likely to deceive the dullest of their readers.

But the secret of the Democratic sympathy with LOUIS NAPOLEON, and of Democratic hostility to Germany and Germans, which the Anzeiger remarks, is not merely the fact that some Irish capital was expected to be made out of it, as the Fenians had declared for France, but is much deeper. It is that the Democratic press for a generation has been engaged in inventing excuses for slave-masters at home, and therefore naturally sympathizes with despots abroad. It has no sympathy with liberty in Europe, because it has been the relentless enemy of liberty in the United States. At this very moment, when it is unwillingly forced to say an apparently kind word for the poor masses in Europe, it is striving to put the poor masses of half of this country under the heel of hatred and prejudice. The moral and political perception of such a press is necessarily obscured. The intelligent and honorable public sentiment of this country has sympathized with Germany in the war, as in our late war it took part with the loyal men and the slaves in the Southern States against the oligarchy of Democratic rebel chiefs. But the former appeal to liberty and the present enemies of equal political rights at home, are instinctively the friends of Cæsarism and the empire abroad.

And even had the present war been merely a contest between KING WILLIAM and LOUIS NAPOLEON, the fact that it was brought on without a pretense of excuse, "begun at the end," as GARIBALDI says by the Emperor, would have determined the sympathy of just and honorable minds. For all the horrible carnage of the last weeks at Hagenau, before METZ and upon the MEUSE—for the anguish of innumerable homes in France and Germany—for the devastation of peaceful countries, the ruin of great public works, and the intolerable waste and loss of war—for the present untold suffering of the people, and for the weight of taxation that will long keep forth the bitterness of to-day, LOUIS NAPOLEON is mortally responsible. The people of Europe, of France as well as of Germany, and the people of the United States will neither forget him nor his feeble apologists elsewhere.

THE DUTY OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

It is under disastrous circumstances that the new republic begins in France, and every human man will wish it moderation and sagacity. But the Foreign Minister, M. JULES FAVRE, began with something very like a mistake. He apparently expected Germany to stay the war. But Germany did not begin it. M. FAVRE declares that he has taken up the war defending himself against the Emperor, and, as the Emperor is gone, M. FAVRE seemed to expect the German armies to retire. But how was the Emperor able to attack Germany? Because of the support of France. The French people have adopted the Emperor's war, and it is for them to say that they wish to stop.

Before these words are printed we hope they may be so. Certainly and justly the new King has no alternative. If from the field of Sedan he had said to the French people, "I have reigned enough, and will you make peace?" there would have been a war of defiance. When he comes under the walls of Paris, if he reiterates the demand, and Paris should reply that it treats with no enemy who stands upon the soil of France, what is King WILLIAM to do? Is he to retire beyond the Rhine, leave the result in confusion, and resume the war if they are rejected? Would the United States of America do so under similar circumstances? The controlling fact of the situation is, that France has adopted the war, and must, therefore, make the first overtures of peace. And this may be the Quixotic point of pride, but from the necessities of the situation. What possible security could Germany have that France, revived under a republic, would not renew the attack?

It is the part for the wise and friendly states to represent to France the demands of the situation, and we have little doubt that they are doing so even now. That France has become a republic does not justify the war. The Germans are on French soil, indeed, but they are there because of the Emperor's war. If Germany had rejected the Emperor; let her repudiate his war, and the Germans will retire. This is the logic of the situation, which M. JULES FAVRE appears to have failed to comprehend; and it is not affected by the change of the form of government.

THE OLD SERPENT.

The tenacious refusal of the Democratic party to recognize any of the fundamental changes wrought by the war, or, more correctly speaking, made evident by the war, is extraordinary. But it is not to be regretted, as it reveals more plainly the tendency and policy of the party. If the bloody attempt at secession might have been supposed to prove any thing, it is that the people of this country will not tolerate the old theory of State sovereignty. Any effort to reorganize that doctrine is necessarily anarchical. That the Union is paramount, that the States, equal as they constitutionally are, have no right, upon any pretense whatever, to disturb the Union, which is the guarantee of that common equality, has been settled finally and forever. The attempt, therefore, to reinstate the old dogma, and under obscure phrases to renew the declaration of the State authority as supreme, is merely a reopening of the whole angry discussion.

Thus the Democratic party of Georgia, not daring to assert openly that the State reserves the right to withdraw from the Union if it chooses, but wishing to foster as ugly and hostile a feeling as possible, has just resolved:

"That the Democratic party of the State of Georgia stand upon the principles of the Democratic party of the Union, bringing into special prominence, as applicable to the present extraordinary condition of the country, the unchangeable determination that this is a Union of States, and not a consolidation of the States, and of their rights, and of their equality with each other. It is unforgiveable party or personal hostility."

This is part of the whole policy of the non-acquiescence of the Democratic party in the results of the war and in reconstruction. It is not satisfied with the decision of the war, and with the repeated judgments of the country. It is not content with the election of 1868, which was an appeal to the people upon the validity of Republican reconstruction, which proceeded upon views wholly irreconcilable with the Democratic theory, and which the Democratic party knows only too well that the moment it leaves its old gross and of injustice to the negro, and proclaims DICKENS figure. The book but also an account of the unpleasant difference of opinion between DICKENS and Lord —— difference which was happily forgotten before THACKERAY died. The tone and treatment of the interesting subject of this little book are unexceptionable, and it is sure to hold a permanent place among the memorials of the author.

THE HARPERS have also published an American novel, "Phis," by Tony Pinckney, by the author of "Inside," and it is truly an American novel, and one of the most original and racy. Like the "Lowell Offering," "Phis" is a "Factory Girl," sub-title of "Inside," it is rather a series of confidences about the factory life developing itself. The theme is the life of a young clergyman in a Southwestern village, just before the war; and around him are collected groups of figures and pictures of society and scenery which are unique in themselves, and are brought out with the most vivid touches of humorous characterization. The book is well worth reading for its freshness and truth, its shrewd observation, and insight into character.

THE Prince De Joinville, who was first known in this country as a young naval officer upon La Belle Poule, and who danced gayly at the ball of the last generation in New York, and who afterward lived among our wars, a grave and older man, with sympathies for the good cause, has just written a manly and touching letter upon the French situation. He takes no excuse, and with fervor, the part of his country. He sees only France desolated and stricken. But he feels this moment of leadership. "A duty to be commanded. Shall we be so?" And again: "The hour has sounded—I cried to direct it. Its efforts of the Prussians will be exhausted in the centre of France, and that they will find their Borodino before Paris, and that they will find there all the great national movement by which France will hold the enemy between her old. Hosts, armies are precious. I am no longer myself." The Prince, who is a man, like his brothers, of intellectual tastes and culture, says that he can not understand the action of the French Chambers, as if they could be any other thought than unanimity and enthusiasm. He says that he has received no reply to his offer to serve in the army where the Empress and Regent are. "Why may be the character of the present Government, it is better than the envisioned one. Here is the pale fact that it is organized. And, if resistance can be prolonged, it is at alone which will have the honor of the conquest. But not a moment is a thing in preference to this alternative." Nothing could more plainly show the superiority of France that such a letter from such a man.

MR. FREDERICK KAPP, long a well-known citizen of New York, and a most efficient Commissioner of Emigration, who returned to Germany after the close of the war, has given the explanation of the greater readiness of the Prussians for the war:

"The reason why we were ready sooner than the French is that the French marched their regiments, battalions, and companies to the frontiers, and there they were to be filled up, or we brought to their reserves, to join their regiments singly as well as they could. The Prussians marched all over Prussia, while according to the Prussian system every regiment is raised in a certain district, where they arrive and those on leave of absence can at once join their regiments. When a Prussian regiment on the peace of its destination it is complete and ready to fight, while it is very difficult in France and other states of Europe to reach the normal war strength of the various regiments in all cases which were ready for the service in every Prussian regiment than were regiments in France. Besides this, the Prussian troops in the field after the battles were relieved, because the excellent number of eagles men offered themselves. Those relieved were also distributed themselves in the war of 1866 are assigned to the fortresses, in order to give the younger men an opportunity to serve in front."

NOTWITHSTANDING the vehement assertion upon the part of many of the bishops who were in Council, the Apostleship of Archbishop PURCELL, that the new dogma does not give the Pope any extra temporal supremacy beyond the rest of his dominions, we observe that the Baron VON BUNSEN, the sagacious Austrian Prime Minister, urged the Emperor to make a concordat between Austria and Rome, upon the ground that it was impossible to maintain relations with a power whose pretensions were suddenly found to be illimitable.

IN his "Life of Charles Dickens," published by Messrs. T.B. PETERSON & CO., Philadelphia, DR. R. SHELTON MACKENZIE offers us a most entertaining and instructive personal and literary history. DR. MACKENZIE is a very warm admirer but not an indiscriminate admirer of the great author, and his graphic and vivacious pen carries the reader on from page to page, from one event of DICKENS's life to another, from one book to the next, blending the story of the man and the author so intimately that the whole work leaves a very characteristic impression of its subject; for in the minds of all his admirers the man DICKENS is inseparable from the novelist. The book is full of fresh anecdotes, and of copious information and speculation upon the originals of many of the most familiar characters in the novels. And it is certainly the best collection of many of DICKENS's uncollected pieces and their hitherto unpublished, with his will and DEAN STANLEY's sermon. It is a fresh and most pleasant survey of the busy and beneficent life of one of the greatest of literary masters.

Necessarily, it was written in haste, but obviously also, the material has been carefully collected, and has been arranged with ease. The wonder has been that so much attribute one or two little "digs," which DICKENS has made, and which jar upon the general good-humor of a book which will be read with great interest by every one who begins it.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE SITUATION IN FRANCE.

IMMEDIATELY upon the declaration of sechisme by the Corps Législatif, and the formation of a provisional government, the Republic was proclaimed at the Hôtel de Ville. A government of national defense composed of the deputies elected for all the boroughs of Paris, was constituted, and ratified by popular acclamation. The name of the cabinet was: JULES FAVRE, President, Jules Favre, Jules Ferry, Garnichts, Garnier-Pagès, Emmanuel Arago, Jules Simon, M. Picard, Rochefort, and Gambetta. General Trochu was appointed Minister of War, and Governor of Paris, with the command of the garrison and the defense of the city. The new ministry at once entered into correspondence with foreign governments, and the Count de Chaudordy raised the Republic as a government de facto, the United States among the first. The King of Italy, it is said, declines to acknowledge the new government, and Switzerland, it is supposed, will wait for the rightful ruler of France.

The proclamation of the surrender of Marshal BAZAINE, which says the Frenchman, keeping a large force to hold the Prussian army in check, and that he was not making a retreat from Sedan, and on the east from Chalons, and were simply changing their base of operations, which left their defenses of Paris intact, are said to be complete. It is generally admitted that no regular siege will be undertaken, and that a bombardment of the Prussians army would take every shell fired into the Germans. King William is said to have declared that he would not attempt to reduce Paris by the ordinary methods of attack, but that he habituate into submission by cutting the railway communications, starving out the army, and reducing the population in a constant panic by means of bursting shells from the forts. The French energetic efforts are making to provision the city for a long siege, and the military strength of the defenders is said to be increasing daily by the arrival of several Army Corps, and bodies with a powerful corps d'armes. The railroads are being destroyed in order to prevent supplies from reaching the Prussian army.

The Prussians were within sight of Metz. It was rumored, but apparently without foundation, that he retreat of Bazaine had been cut off, and that the position of his army broke through the Prussian lines and joined the forces of Prince Frederick Charles and Steinmetz. It is reported that a deputation has set out from Berlin to negotiate for peace. The Prussians have issued a proclamation in which they declare no indulgence on the fortune of the war, and that they will not treat with the Republic. The Empress Eugénie and Prince Napoleon are at Hastings. The Empress Eugénie and her son are at the Marine Hotel in Ryde. Napoleon is still suffering with the stone, and has undergone a second cut touching. The Prince threw himself into the mêlée of battle, and was taken prisoner.

It is reported that Intrigues among some of the German princes have arisen against the Prussian government but determined to forestall all revolutionary movements, the Prussian Crown Prince has issued a proclamation of his intention to assume without the slightest intention of narrowing the People, and to maintain the Constitution of the North German Confederation. The election of the College of Cardinals has given in their adhesion to the Pope's policy of this week. The Italian army holds all the roads north and south leading into the Papal territory. The Pope's Council sits in the Sala Vecchia. No conflict is anticipated with the Zouaves, General Kanzler the Papal Minister of War, giving it his opinion that the Papal forces do not "justify any attack on the Italians." The Italian government has notified the Italian government that if has no intention to attack the Papal troops, but that it will defend itself if attacked. The capital of the city a popular vote will be taken throughout the Papal States on the annexation of the Roman territory to Italy.

CHAPTER II.

How the Danish Adventurers settled Reykjavik.—Primitive Inhabitants for Chart and Compass.—The Interior of Iceland.—A Volcanic Chasm.—Traveling on Horseback.

ABOUT eight hundred years ago two young Danish noblemen, who had made themselves amenable to the law, by some act of rapine or violence, found themselves compelled to quit their country. They were still strong enough, however, to attach to themselves a considerable number of attendants and followers—sufficient to found a colony—and they concluded to sail to the northwest, and take possession of some one of the islands which were known to exist there; for the art of navigation, as rudely though very effectively practiced in those days, had already made very considerable progress.

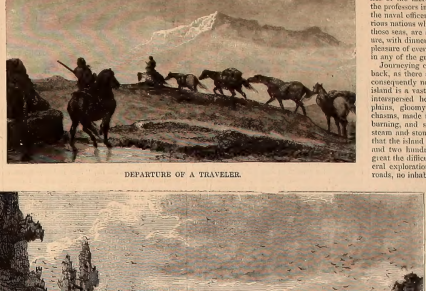
So they embarked their goods and their men on board a ship, and set sail. It seems that the Faroe Islands had already been settled, for the account states that they touched at these islands on their way, to visit some friends. On leaving the Faroe Islands they steered to the northward, in search of Iceland, and they adopted a very ingenious mode of finding it. They had three or four sacred birds on board, such as it seems were customarily used by navigators in those times for the purpose about to be described. After sailing two days they released one of the birds from the deck of the ship, accompanying the act with certain very solemn religious ceremonies. The bird ascended high into the air, and then, after apparently making its survey, turned to the southward and flew back toward the Faroe Islands. This made it evident that the voyagers had not yet proceeded far enough.

They sailed on for two days more, and then released another bird. This second messenger went high into the air, and after hovering about for a time, descended and alighted again on board the ship.

They sailed on. A day or two afterward they sent forth a third bird. This last envoy, after ascending as the others had done, flew off toward the northward. They inferred that the land of their destination was in sight, and followed the direction which the flight of the bird had indicated.

Whether this method of finding the way at sea, in lieu of the compass, quadrant, and charts of the present day, was invented by the navigators of those times, or was derived from the Mosaic account of Noah and his dove, is left to conjecture.

When the ship which conveyed these adventurers approached the coast they decided, upon their place of landing not through any survey or examination of the shores, but by means of a religious rite very characteristic of the times. They threw overboard certain pieces of wood which were derived from their ancient household goods or furniture—and so were invested with a sacred character in their eyes—and followed these as their guide, wherever the winds and currents conveyed them. They were led in this way to the harbor of Reykjavik, so says the legend: and in this way that spot became the seat of the colony.



DEPARTURE OF A TRAVELER.

The settlement which these adventurers thus commenced was increased from time to time, by the coming of other fugitives and exiles, until at length it became quite an important colony. The rapidity of its growth was greatly increased by religious persecution in the mother country, in consequence of which, in the two or three succeeding centuries, great numbers of people were driven from their native land. It is undoubtedly to think to how great an extent the dispersion of mankind over the earth, in modern times, has been owing to the cruelty and hate which superstition, in the name of religion, has enkindled in the heart of man against his fellow-man. Results of vast and inexpressible benefit to the race have thus been accomplished through the agency of the most hateful passions, and at the cost of an inconceivable amount of the most intense and bitter individual suffering.

The colony gradually increased as centuries rolled on, and though the resources of the community were small, the people were frugal and industrious; and as a regular, though not frequent, intercourse was kept up with the mother country, a considerable degree of refinement and cultivation was attained by certain classes of the inhabitants. A recent visitor to the island, from whose narrative we derive many of the facts stated in this article, M. Xoel Nogaret, says that he found sixteen pianos in Reykjavik, and that during the five open months of the year the fashionable society of the place, consisting of the families of the merchants, the government officers, the professors in the institutions of learning, and the naval officers from on board the ships of various nations which during that season often visit these seas, are so much occupied, in their measure, with dinners, balls, concerts, and parties of pleasure of every kind, as the corresponding class in any of the great cities of more genial climes.

Journeying can only be performed on horseback, as there are no roads in the country, and consequently no carriages. The interior of the island is a vast desert of rugged volcanic rocks, interspersed here and there with sulphureous plains, gloomy and solitary lakes, and vast chasms, made terrible sometimes by craters still burning, and sometimes by vent-holes ejecting steam and stones and fire. When we consider that the island is about three hundred miles long and two hundred broad, it is easy to see how great the difficulties must be of making any general exploration of so vast a territory, with no roads, no inhabitants, no water communications, no resources for food, and no natural shelter.

A VOLCANIC CHASM.

Still the people have a mode of journeying of their own. They have a race of horses on the island somewhat like the ponies of the neighboring Shetlands—small, wild, or at least not more than half civilized, but which answer tolerably well as beasts of burden, provided the burdens are not too heavy. The amount of baggage which a party requires is large, as the tents, the forage, the provisions, and every thing else that is required must be carried, even to a supply of horseshoes and nails; and as the animals are not strong enough to carry the requisite loads continuously, and as no relays can be procured on the route, it is necessary to take two sets of beasts, so that each may do the work in turn and relieve the others, those relieved having thus only to walk along at their ease, with no burdens to bear, until their turn comes round again. This system involves the necessity of taking a large number of animals, which make, when the party is moderately large, quite a long cavalcade.

The horses employed on this service are provided with very little harness or tackling. The silence and solitude, when they fairly enter the interior, bring such that they seem to be inspired, like the human visitor whom they convey, with a sense of solemnity and awe, and are only too glad to keep at all times close to their companions. At the commencement of their journey, however, they are usually ready enough to break away from the caravan and return, so that some restraint upon their freedom is required for a certain time. The arrangement made to secure this is to fasten the spare horses each between two bridled ones, and to connect the whole train by fastening the head of each horse to the tail of the one preceding him. Thus the traveler at the outset of his journey sees a very whimsical cavalcade setting out before him, with his guide on the foremost horse to lead the way.

It is necessary to keep the horses thus under restraint for some distance, until they are far enough away from home to feel when freed a greater sense of safety in keeping with their companions than in attempting to return. Both men and horses are glad when this time comes; the horses because they are liberated from restraint, and the men because they can now travel at their ease, and at a more rapid rate. For, of course, while fastened together in a line in such a manner, it is only at a very slow pace that animals can advance over or rough a country, with nothing but the merest tracks to guide them, or in the interior of Lapland without even so much. When liberated from their fastenings to each other the horses can go on pretty well, and they all, whether dun or light, follow the one obediently in line, unless, perchance, a spot of verdure comes within sight, to the more nimble among. Then they have no hesitation in breaking ranks and making the best of their way, heedless of all remonstrance, to the favored spot. Here they become completely "demoralized," and it requires disciplinary measures of the most energetic character, on the part both of the traveler and his guide, to bring them back to their duty. Some of them are so thoroughly intoxicated with delight that they lie down and attempt to roll upon the grass, with their burden of baggage bound to their backs.

Nor is the country entirely without inhabitants. As far back as my experience extends, but is here and there found, occupied by the peasant owner of the animals that feed upon the grass. These are all roofed with turf, and some of them, from a distance, present the aspect of a mere grass-covered eminence, but built up in some sheltered corner or recess of the rocks, with an opening for entrance to the east, like the hole of a wild beast, or the entrance to a tomb. Some of these peasants have made reformation, and to all such pitiable wretches as come their way.

In some portions of the island there are groups of huts, scattered habitations sufficient in number to accommodate a population large enough to form a parish, and to support a church. The churches thus provided are, perhaps, the simplest and most unpretending temples of worship to be found on the globe. They are built of wood, on foundations of lava. Many of them stand in the most wild and unlikely spots, and are accessible only by the roughest paths; and they are often used, as will be seen more fully in the sequel, for other than religious purposes. The minister lives in the neighborhood of the church, sometimes in one of the same log-tenements before described. The religion he teaches is Lutheran. There are one or two hundred churches scattered over the island, and for a short distance into the interior of the island, over whose surface, in a state of simple barbarism, and free and familiar in their intercourse with the people, presides.

CHAPTER XVII.

WORKING ON A FRUIT.

NEVER had Richard been in such high spirits as on the evening of that day on which Harry had made confession to him of her love, and had promised to be his wife should her father's consent be gained. It was true that she had been far from smiling upon the lover's suit; but Richard had his reasons for being of a different opinion. It would be better, every way, if he could obtain Trevethick's good-will; not that he at all shared in the girl's dread of his anger, but because it was essential that if he were separated from her father's roof he should be fulfilling his mother's injunction in making others as well as own heiress. What with his two thousand pounds in gold, and his inn, and his lucky mine, it was plain that the old man would have no difficulty in soon to leave behind him; and yet, to do Richard justice, this only formed an additional incentive to a project upon which, at all events, he had long set his heart. He had received at all hazards to make the girl his wife. Now, indeed, her was as deep as it was passionate; and now that he was convinced how her own life lay in being returned, his heart was filled with joy, and spoke out of its abundance. It had been hitherto his habit in that family circle reserved for the parlor fire to play the part of listener rather than of talker. He had mainly confined himself to the exhibition of an attentive interest in Solomon's stories, or in his friend's sagacious observations with regard to the investment of money such as: "One couldn't be too cautious where one put one's money;" which, by the way, Richard was high the risk was great, and where it was low it was not worth while to let it leave one's hand," or, next to the subject of Shakespearians, "investment" was the favorite subject of debate between Trevethick and "Sol;" and Richard, whose ignorance insured his impartiality, had been the judicious scale-holder between them. But upon this important occasion it was a young artist who led the talk and chose the matter. He told them of the splendors of Constantinople, of the marvelous prodigality of its owner, and they listened with greedy ears. To vulgar natures the topic of mere wealth is ever an attractive one, and in the present instance there was an additional whet to appetite in the connection of Carew with it. He was naturally an object of curiosity to "sir tennat Trevethick, and more before had the old man had the opportunity of hearing at first hand of the eccentricities of the Squire. In relation, then Richard took good care to show by implication on what intimate terms he stood with him, and hinted at the obligation under which he had put him by throwing his jack gate open so opportunely. The impression which he left upon his audience, and desired to leave, was, that Carew was indebted to him for having saved his life.

"Then it is likely the Squire would do anything for you that you chose to ask him?" observed Trevethick, with the thought of his own credit to Solomon's father doubtless in his mind.

"Well, he certainly ought to do so," answered Richard, modestly; "but, on the other hand, it is not very probable that I shall put him to the test."

"Just so," returned Trevethick, sucking at his pipe; "you're independent of the rich likes of him."

"Altogether," was Richard's reply.

The old man spoke no more, but sat in a cloud of smoke and thought for the rest of the evening. Even when "Sol" rose up to go—Harry having retired long since, for they kept very early hours in the Golden Lion—the landlord did not, as usual, accompany him, but mixed himself another glass of grog and sat down. It was clear that it was not his custom to seek his bed until after midnight; so Trevethick and he were left to one another's company, and to an opportunity to which the latter had been looking forward for many days, and which he had begun to think scarcely as at that moment.

"Are you likely to be at Compton soon again?" inquired the landlord, pursuing the subject of the evening's talk.

"I have no intention of going there at present," returned Richard. "The fact is, Mr. Trevethick, between ourselves, I am not very welcome in comparison at the house of those I most here, and their ways and habits are too expensive for me."

"Ay! gambling and such like, I suppose?" observed the landlord, cunningly. "It is 'Lucky Jack' the gal will be the means of that sort of folk, I reckon."

"Just so; and though my money comes light enough—that is, I have not to earn it, since my mother makes me an allowance—I don't choose to risk it at the cards."

"Quite right, quite right, young gentleman," answered the other, approvingly. "Keep your money, a good prudent gentry even as Crompton, I suppose. Parson Whymper, for instance, he ain't gambling, do he?"

"Certainly not; he is much too sagacious a man, even if he were inclined that way," but Richard, indeed, some say the Squire would have come to the end of his tether before this. He has been extravagant, I fear, ever since he was at Lutheun. There are one or two hundred churches scattered over the island, and for a short distance into the interior of the island, over whose surface, in a state of simple barbarism, and free and familiar in their intercourse with the people, presides.

"Ah! I know that well enough," answered Richard, smiling; "and it is scarcely fair of me to speak of his extravagance to you, for you are sufficiently wont it so much but that he can still afford to indulge his whims, Mr. Trevethick, if that's what you mean."

"That's just what I did mean," said the old man, frankly. "Six months ago or so I was under a certain proposition to the Squire, which would have been exceedingly to his advantage to accept—"

"And not to yours?" interrupted Richard, slyly.

"Nay, I don't say that, Sir," answered the other. "But it was one that he ought to have been glad to accept in any case, and which he was downright madness in him to refuse, if he wanted cash. It was a chance, but it was the best to say, that will never offer itself from any other quarter. Mr. Whymper acknowledged that himself."

"I know all about the matter, Mr. Trevethick: the Squire behaved like a fool, and I am no stranger to you that he won't work the mine himself, nor yet let you work it."

"For mercy's sake, be quiet!" cried the landlord, earnestly, and looking cautiously about him. "If you know all about it, you must know that it is you know. What would you talking about? Give it a name—but speak it under your breath, man. The words sounded almost solemn when white moist face, and peered into Richard's eyes as though he would read his soul.

"What! you mean the name of the place, if I remember right," said Richard. "Carew has a notion that Solomon did not find it out by any, and that it only wants capital to make it a paying concern. It is one of his mad ideas, don't you think, Mr. John Trevethick?" he said, by nature a quick appreciator of sarcasm, but he could not understand the irony expressed in Richard's words.

"And is that what you some down to Gethin about?" inquired the host, with a sort of grim despair which had nevertheless a comical effect.

Richard could only trust himself to nod his head assentingly.

"Well," cried the other, striking the table with his fist, "if I don't think he was as deep as the devil the very first day that I set eyes on him, I'm a Jew—I'm convicted on him, Mr. Trevethick uttered an execration terrible enough for a Christian giant.

"I am not Mr. Whymper's man at all," observed Richard, coolly. "Mr. Whymper is not my friend, and never will be one after this interview."

"How so?" inquired the landlord, his eyes set their full stretch, his mouth agape, and his neglected pipe in his right hand.

"Who, in the friend's name, are you?"

"I am the only son and heir of Carew of Crompton," answered the young man, deliberately.

"You? Why, Carew never had a son," exclaimed Trevethick, incredulously. "Leastways, not since he had left the married state, and a wench of the name of Hardcastle, 'tis true; but that was just noble.

"I tell you I am Carew's lawful son, nevertheless," persisted Richard. "My mother was privately married to him. Ask Parson Whymper, and he will tell you the same. It is true that my father has not acknowledged me, but I shall have my rights some day—and Wheal Danes along with the rest."

The sense of the young man's paternity must have been sufficiently startling to him who then received it for the first time, and would, under any other circumstances, have doubtless excited his phlegmatic nature to a like emotion; but Richard found himself even in a slight degree is, with some of us, more absorbing than the most vital interests of another; and thus it was with Trevethick. The ambitious pretensions of his lodger sank into insignificance—notwithstanding for the moment, he believed in them; for how, unless he was what he professed to be, could he know so much? before the disappointment which had befallen himself in the overthrow of a long-cherished hope.

"Mr. Whymper wrote me with his own hand," growled he, "that in his judgment the mine was worthless, and that he had done all he could to persuade the Squire to sell. And yet you come down here to gouge and spy—"

"I am incapable of a fair in war and business," answered the young man, smiling. "Come, Mr. Trevethick, for reasons may have brought me here, I assure you, upon my honor, that they do not weigh with me now, in connection with your interests. I feel for you and yours. If you will be frank with me, I will also be so with you, and the result may be to your benefit, by being which may drop from your lips shall be made use of to prejudice your interests. I have already said for myself, that what—"

"Hush, Sir! for any sake, hush!" implored the landlord, starting and holding up his huge hand for silence. "Do not give it a name again; there is some one moving above stairs."

"It is only Solomon," observed Richard, quietly.

"I don't want Sol nor any other man alive to hear what we are talking about, Mr. Yorke," answered Trevethick, hoarsely. "You have gotten hold for yourself—you were about to say, that the mine is rich, and well worth what I have offered for it."

"And a good deal more," interrupted Richard. "Perhaps a hundred times, perhaps a thousand times more. But I do not think we can close a secret of a matter without our reasons. We don't see Dead Hands, with fingers of fire, in the finger-bowls, up and down ladders that don't exist, without the most excellent reasons, Mr. Trevethick. What we want to say, for the present, is this, and will worth what I have offered for it."

"Yes, yes, I have been silent for a little: he felt a lump rise in his throat, as though nature itself forbade him to disclose the secret he had kept so long and so closely, guarded. "I have known it for these fifty years," he began, in a half-choking voice. "I found it, and never told, and I went down into the old mine one day for sport, with some schoolmates. The vein lies in the bowel just at the dip I am working, at a depth that we think nothing of nowadays, though it was too deep for the old masters of the pit. I remember, as though it was yesterday, how my heart leaped within me when my torch shone upon it, and I knew, by its dark and perilous fellows should see it also. I came back the next day alone, to certify my great discovery. I did so, and found that there was one. The copper there may be worth tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of pounds, but the fear of the association table been invested with such significance, Trevethick's giant frame shook with emotion; his eyes literally flashed with greed.

"You have been there since?" observed Richard, interrupting him.

"Often, often," answered the other, hoarsely. "I could not keep away. But nobody else has been there. The mine is dark and perilous: there are rats, and bats, and eerie creatures at best it. And then, how afraid, because of the Dead Hand and the Flame."

"Your hand and torch?"

"Yes. I was afraid to keep the place my own; my thoughts were never absent from it for an hour. And I said myself I had a little money I put it by, and more to that, and move to that again, till I had got enough to make a bid for the lease of the old mine. But Carew was under age; so that fell through. I bided my time, and bid again; not much—only enough to keep off suspicion—but still what would seem a good price for a disused pit. Then I waited and more; but Carew will neither sell nor let; and my money grows and grows in value. I tell you I have held by a fortune and to spur into his hand. It is ready for him to-night; there would be no haggling, no asking for time—the cash paid him in hard coin. How long, thought I, will this madman balk me with his whim? He will die some day in his cups, or break his neck in hunting, and I shall surely come in with my offer to his heir, and have the pick of at last, and not before. But now, after all my patience and my pains, I am overmatched by a Parson and a Boy." Trevethick's voice became hoarse and passion—not complainingly. His face was dark, and his tone was fierce and menacing. There was no mistake about his having accepted his companion's invitation to be frank.

"Mr. Trevethick," said Richard, gravely, "your disappointment would be natural enough, if your long-cherished plan had really failed; but you have misunderstood me altogether. I am grateful to you for confiding to me the secret, and I shall be honored in part; and you shall have no reason to regret your confidence. Your secret is safer now than it has ever been; for from my lips Mr. Whymper shall never have his suspicions with respect to Wheal Danes confirmed. I have been too long your guest, I feel myself too much the friend of you and yours, to act in any way to your disadvantage."

Trevethick looked at him inquiringly, suspicion and disfavor glowing in his dusky face. "But if your story is true, young gentleman, this mine will be your own some day."

"It may, or it may not be, Mr. Trevethick. My father's intentions are not to be counted upon, and may possibly be well aware, for many hours. But if ever Wheal Danes is mine—" Richard paused a moment, while his thousand devoured him with his eyes.

"Well, what then?" cried Trevethick, impatiently, "what then?"

"I am willing to make over to you, as soon as I come of age, by deed, all interest that I may have in your own constitution."

"Make over Wheal Danes to me by deed! What! at my own price?"

"At whatever price you shall have it for a free gift."

"But the condition? What is it that you want of me that is not money?"

"I want permission from you, Mr. Trevethick, to wed, that is—for I would not speak of love without your leave—to woo your daughter."

"To wed my daughter!" cried Trevethick, starting from his seat; "my Harry!"

"I say provided that my suit is not displeasing to her," answered Richard, not without a tremor in his voice, for the old man's face was terrible to look upon. Hatred and Wrath were in close league with Avarice, and had the upper hand.

He reeked himself to and fro, then answered, in a stifled voice, "My daughter's hand is already promised, young man."

"I may be so, Mr. Trevethick, but not by her, I think; and that her heart has not been given to the man you have designated for her, is certain. You may see that for yourself."

"I tell you I have passed my word to Solomon Coe that she shall be his wife," returned the other, gloomily, "and I am not one to go back from a bargain."

"One can only promise what is in one's power," urged Richard; "your daughter's heart is not to be given at a backing the man's vote you have already redeemed your word to him. If he has failed to win her affections, I think it is his—but we are to try my chance. I am a fitter match for her in years; I am a gentleman, and therefore fitter for her, for she is a lady. And I love her a thousand times as much as he. Ask for Wheal Danes, I would give you every penny, if I had them, for the leave I ask for, and the end I hope for."

It was curious to mark how the mere mention of the mine by name effected the old man; his wrath, which seemed on the very point of explosion, was checked and smothered at once, like raging waves by oil: his brow, indeed, was still dark and lowering, but he resumed his seat, and listened, or seemed to listen, to Richard's impassioned pleading. His genuine feeling made the young fellow quite eloquent, and a tender charm to his always handsome face and winning tones.

Perhaps, even the unsympathetic Trevethick was really somewhat touched: at all events, he did not interrupt him, but when his talk quite finished took out his watch, and said, in a softened tone: "The hour is late, Mr. Yorke, and you have given me much to think about, to which I can not reply just now. Your communication has taken me by surprise. I will not answer neither 'Yes' nor 'No' at present. Good night, Sir." He nodded, which was his usual salute at parting; but upon the young man's eagerly stretching out his hand, he took it readily enough, and gave it such a squeeze with his giant fingers as made Richard wince. Then, smiling grimly, he retired.

As his heavy step toiled up stairs Richard perceived a slip of paper on the floor, which had apparently fallen out of the pocket of his host's coat. Upon it were written the three letters, B, N, Z. As he held it in his hand he heard the landlord's tread returning with the same name, and had only just time to replace the paper, face downward, on the sanded floor, before the other reappeared.

"I have dropped a memorandum, somewhere," said he, "as I of no great consequence, but— Oh, here it is!" He picked it up, and replaced it in the hollow of his great hand, and then, Richard, who was sitting where he had left him, looked up with a glance of careless inquiry. "Good night again, Mr. Trevethick."

"Good-night, Sir," And again the landlord smiled in his grim fashion.

CHAPTER XVIII.

BY MOONLIGHT.

RICHARD sat over the fire, revolving his late conversation with Trevethick in his mind, and picturing to himself what would proceed from of it. Although the declaration of his love for Harry had been thus suddenly made, it had not been premature. Though he had never had expected the opportunity for stating it would have been afforded him, he had prepared his whole argument out beforehand, down to the first words of his pivot. And, upon the whole, he felt content with the result. He had not been bitter had not surprised him (except by his frankness) in his disclosure respecting the rich promises of the mine. Richard's own observation, aided by the clew which Parson Whymper's few chance sentences had given him, had convinced him that Wheal Danes was a most coveted object in the landlord's eyes, and that he had happened to have fallen into his own hands, he did really suspect enough to have had it searched for one from top to bottom. Trevethick had therefore lost nothing by his revelation (as his sagacity had doubtless foreseen), while he had made a very favorable impression upon Richard by his candor, in coming at once, straightforward, to the point, he had not been peremptorily closed at once (as he had expected it would have been), which was a great point gained, and the longer the old man took to think about the matter the more likely was self-interest to gain the day with him. Nevertheless Richard's representations to have been correct, he was certainly a better match! Ay! that was well. Solomon was: and he had no apprehension of their being refuted. Trevethick would in all probability write to Mr. Whyting to inquire into the truth of them—but what then? He would certainly make no reference to the mines: and as to Richard being Carew's lawful son, had not the chaplain himself (whom he could count on as a friend in any all that was to his advantage besides) admitted that, in his eyes, he was born in honest wedlock? At all events, there would be ample excuse for his having taken such a view of the case; while, as to his prospects, he had frankly confessed that he was, for the present, to be acknowledged by the Squire. So long, in fact, as he could keep up the pretense of his mines' being worthless, the greater would be his chance of another present or contingent, at Crompton, he felt his position with Trevethick tolerably secure.

In all this scheme of dark duplicity he knew for Harry was interwoven like a golden thread, and amidst all his plots and plans her glorious image would steadily rise unbidden, and chase him from them. He had long since resolved to win her, but the late arrival of her lover (for he knew now his partial success to gain her father's favor, seemed to have made her his own already. How beautiful she looked that day! how radiant, even with the sunlight on her hair! How fresh and spotless were her ways! How her companions were lovable, and the cause of love. How touching was her simple faith in omens, and how pleasant to contrast it, his arm about her waist, even as though to protect her from the shadow of harm! How joyful her first look of welcome had been, and of this Cornish Solomon; and how sweet to calm it, kissing her tears away! Once more his loving arms enclosed her—once more his lips touched her warm cheeks—when a sudden noise awakened him from his dream of bliss.

The pine fire had long gone out. It was warm for the time of year, but had it been otherwise he would not have ventured to light the candles, too, had burned out, and the moon-beams were streaming through the window: but had it been dark he would scarce have thought of doing it. The house had long ago been hushed in repose, and yet Richard felt certain that he had heard a movement in the passage.

A stealthy step, yet not that of thief or burglar—a fairy footfall, rather, which seemed to his ear. His heart leaped up to tell him that on the other side of the door was Harry Trevethick. He held his breath, and trembled—not for fear. Was it possible that, knowing he was sitting there alone, she had come down to see her own choice to bear him company? Had her father told her something—some glad tidings which she could not keep from her lover even for a night? Or, filled with sweet dreams of him, as he of her, had she risen in her white robes and drawn involuntarily toward him by the loadstone of love? Hot—hark! The bolt that fastened the house-door was softly drawn, and that, too, gently lifted. What could that mean? Why was she not coming forth alone, and unexpectedly, at midnight? His heart beat faster than ever. For an instant all that he had read or heard from his wild companions, and all that he had himself believed until he came to Gethin, of the wiles and inconstancy of women, flashed upon his mind. Had he, bred in the town, and familiar with all the ways of vice, been flattered and hoodwinked by a country girl's artless, fluent rubbie. For, though there were no virtue in the world, he felt assured that Harry loved him, and him alone. She must be walking in her sleep. Softly, but very swiftly, he left the parlor, and hurried to the front-door. It was bolted, but unfastened. He opened it, and looked out. All was as light as day, and yet so different. Every object in the street, every stone in the cottage opposite, stood out distinct and clear, but bathed in a pale and ghostly atmosphere. A low, dull murmur of the sea came to him like the sigh of a just freed from pain. Nothing else was to seen; no human trend disturbed the midstillness; but along the winding road that Turlick he caught the far-off flutter of a lress. She was going at rapid speed, e next moment had turned the corner, a before he had recovered from the asting the im door softly behind him, he ew her like an arrow from the bow, and ene of this pursuit was strange and aagh, had Richard possessed eyes for ything but the object in it. From the point Richard for a full second see the road stretching middle, wit a white ribbon, and on the It led to Tippet between high banks. path struck by, but at this place a foot-fields to the Fairies' Bower. To his astonishment, though indeed he had scarcely capacity enough for further wonder, Harry took this path; he saw her climb the stile, and then for the first time look round; he sank under the hedge, to hide himself; and when he cautiously looked forth again she had vanished. But he knew whither she was going now. He had assisted her across that very stile but a few days ago; he had walked with her through the hazel copse, and skirted the clear trout-stream by her side. He, and no other, had her now at utmost speed, and with less caution, for the path was green and unfrequented, to hear his heart beat—not from want of breath—as though in accord with the silver treble of the brook. Through the dark and dewy leafy foliage of the dell he saw her light dress gleam across the wooden bridge. He heard her panting beside it, peering through the lattice of the branches upon her as she stood on the green sward by the Whyting Mill.

Never had moon-beams shone upon a sight more fair. Harry was dressed as she had been on the previous evening, except that she wore a shawl, which also served her as head-gear, like a hood. This she now threw back upon her neck, as the pin that had joined it together, held it above the veil, which showed, as it was parted in front, her hair curving form, her wealth of hair, her frightened yet hopeful eyes, and the rise and fall of her bosom which told its anxiety and agitations save. She had come to test her future—to foresee her fate—at Gethin Whyting Well! By an instant she perceived, yet, her fear at the same time marvelously some simple charm—then dropped it into the well—then looked and watched it fall. As she did so, another figure seemed to glide upon the liquid mirror, at the gift of which she had come, and then was instantly hided. Superstitious as she was, Harry had only half expected that her foolish ceremony would actually gratified. Moved by the avowal of Richard's love that morning, the obstacles to their union, and the fear of offending her father, she wished to see her future husband, to know how he would decide between her and the one to whom her father had chosen for her, and yet she was terrified now that that which she had wished was realized. She, who had come expressly to look upon yonder shadowy form, although its presence seemed to assure her of Richard's love, had not expected it. It was the counterfeit presentment of Richard Yorke himself; bareheaded as he was, and with the light full upon his face, but with heightened color, an eager smile, and a loving gratitude in his eyes, which seemed to thank her for having so unconsciously done his love for. The figure was at right angles from her own, but the face was confronting her. She gazed upon it intently, looking for it to faint and fade, since its mission had been accomplished, but it remained for a little, as though to express consent, yet there was the vision still, a glorious picture in the light of the moon and the grass and greenery. Supposing it should remain there (her pale face flushed as the thought) indelibly and forever, to tell the story of her love to all the world! Then a whisper, that seemed to tremble beneath the height of love, "Harry! Harry! Harry!" and she looked up, and saw the substance of the shadow, her lover, standing upon the little wooden bridge!

Though Folly be near kin to Vice, she does not acknowledge the relationship, and, to do Harry Trevethick justice, he never once thought he made a midnight assignation with Richard in the Fairies' Bower. She was, indeed, somewhat shocked at the too literal fulfillment of her wish than pleased to see him there. She shed tears at her very advent, and was ashamed of her hitherto maintained, with respect to her affection for him, but now, she promised, she would put away by her own act. The scene to which he had just been an unsuspected witness was more than sufficient to put her resolution to the test. It was a leap-year offer of her hand and heart. She had no strong-hold even in a hiding-place, such as Sarah Penhale herself, or even a halting-place, such as coy maidens love to linger at a little before they surrender, "I am yours."

There was nothing left her but revilings. She poured upon him a torrent of contumely, not touching him for their bitterness, his cowardice, his treachery in tracking her hither, like a spy, to overhear a confession that was not for his ears uttered with him of all men. Whatever that confession might have been—and, to say truth, so nearly successful—it was now lost to him. Whatever hopes, her loving yearnings, that she knew not she had, were lost to him, but uttered aloud—she now retracted it; she had no tenderness for eaves-droppers, for deceivers, for—she did not know what she said. Anything to wound him. Above all things it seemed necessary to make it appear to be as contrary to her wish against him as possible. The copiousness of her vocabulary of abuse surprised herself, and she had not already been assuring him, that, although at last for want of breath, and even then, as though she had exhausted her resources of silence, she bemoaned herself with sobs and sighs.

Then Richard, all tenderness and submission, explained his presence there, and his motive, which he was to blame in the matter, and, indeed, how there were neither shame nor sin in his love—how to either of them; spoke of his late interview with her father, gilding it with brightest hopes, and cited the marvelous circumstance of his Wishing Well itself in support of his position. He felt himself already her affianced husband; the question of their union had become only one of time. She was listening to him now, and had suffered him to kiss her tears away, when suddenly she started from his embrace with a muffled cry of terror. Some movement of head or hand in the copse had made a rustling in the underwood, but her fears gave it a human shape. "What if her father should have followed her!" As Richard had followed her! What if her father should have heard her leave his roof, as Richard had, or should miss her from it—and then to think this path: he saw her climb this stile, and then for the first time look round; he sank under the hedge, to hide himself; and when he cautiously looked forth again the girl had vanished. THE LAST MESSAGE.—[DRAWN BY PAUL FRIESEKE.]

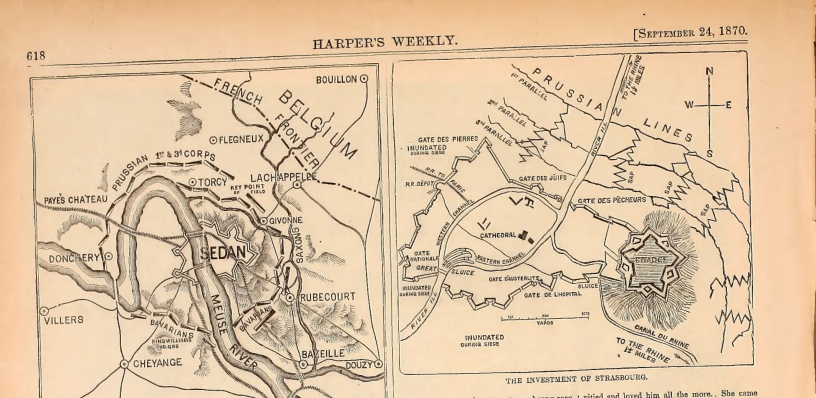
AFTER THE SURRENDER—MASSES OF FRENCH PRISONERS UNDER PRUSSIAN GUARD.



SEDAN AND STRASBOURG.

THE plan of Sedan, which we give on this page, shows the positions occupied by the Prussian armies investing that fortress on the day of the capitulation of M'MAHON. It exhibits at a glance the hopelessness of the French situation there, and explains the surrender of so large a body of men.

The plan of Strasbourg shows the lines of investment up to September 10, when the Prussians had completed their third parallel. Next to Metz, this city is considered the strongest fortress of France on the eastern frontier. Its defenses consist of a bastioned enceinte, very irregular in outline; the bastions constructed at intervals along its perimeter, varying in each instance, but admirably well located for flanking support and defense. The numerous re-entering angles in the trace of the enceinte are well secured by towers and demi-bastions of suitable construction, while the salients are protected by a powerful crown-fire from the supporting works. The main ditch is filled with water for nearly the whole distance around the city. Between the city proper and the Rhine, and connected with the enceinte and occupying a commanding position, is the Citadel, pronounced to be a master-work of VAUBAN. It is constructed on a pentagon, according to the great engineer's first system, and presents five great bastions, with their supporting works, and effectually commands the city and the Rhine. This strong-hold has been much improved during the past twenty years, and is jealously guarded from inspection by strangers. Immediately close to the Citadel, on the city side, are the great arsenals and military institutions for which Strasbourg is famous—the Salles d'Armes, the Military Hospital, the Artillery School, and the Arsenal de Construction, and also a magnificent esplanade.

INFELICE.

THE summer morning was dawning, and the violet and golden and crimson tints were beginning to shine through the trees of the parks, when the Honorable MRS. Milner drove home in her carriage from one of the latest balls of the season. MRS. Milner lived in one of the most fashionable streets of the Mayfair region of London. She was a young woman and handsome; but just now her face wore that faint, weary, and jaded air which beauty itself acknowledges when, after a night of pleasure, the dawn shines upon it. MRS. Milner was very tired and sleepy, and the dawn made her shudder.

When the carriage drove up to the door, and the footmen pulled down, there seemed something like a little commotion going forward, and MRS. Milner, being too impatient to wait, got out and found that her servants were very angry with a boy who had been asleep on the naked door-step in the dawn, and was so sleepy that he could hardly be roused to a sense of his situation and his audacity.

"Come, you be hoff!" said one pampered menial—a very worthy poor fellow in his way, but who really thought in an etiquette of his duty to keep vagabonds from his mistress's door-step as JAVERT believed it his duty to unmask and arrest concealed felons. "Come, you be hoff! I wonder there's no policemen about!"

"Now then, young feller," remarked the other pampered menial, decisively, "it's time you were away. Move on!"

The boy only rubbed his eyes and looked sleepily at the servants. He was a very handsome boy, looking a little like one of MURILLO's immortal gamins, with thick curling hair, and skin almost as dark as that of an Algerian. Certainly part at least of the dark hue was attributable to want of washing.

"Let me see the boy," said the Hon. MRS. Milner.

She looked at him with eyes of kindly interest. Under the counsels of a fashionable Aunt End women there does sometimes beat a kind and tender heart, for all the Saturday Reviews.

"Poor boy!" she said. He must have been very tired. He is a fine-looking child. Why did you sleep there, my little boy? Have you no home?"

"No home, madonna!" said the lad, who had roused up wonderfully in the light of the lady's kind eyes. He spoke a lisping, broken English. He was evidently an Italian lad, and his face now spoke, if faces may be trusted, intelligence and truthfulness.

"Bring him into the hall," said MRS. Milner, decisively.

He was brought in, and she talked to him in his own language. His story was simple, commonplace, and old. He was born in Parma. His father and mother were dead. He had come to London on the inducement of other Italian boys to make a fine living by grinding the organ—the padrone ground him much more effectually than the organ; and he made up his mind at last to run away and get into the fresh, bountiful country where the birds sang and the flowers grew. From the Saffron Hill region, the home or lair of the organ-boy, he had tramped as far as his way. He chose the Hyde Park direction because he had often admired the trees there, and he thought the country could be reached in that way. He had contrived to steal out of his wretched den when midnight had long passed, and he was so tired and sleepy as he reached Mrs. Milner's tempting door that he thought it would be pleasant to have only one more sleep, and then to shoulder up on the door-step and fall asleep.

MRS. Milner said he must be sure never to sleep on door-steps any more. That he might be the less in the way of temptation, she bade him sleep in a good soft rug in the hall just then, and she told the servants to be sure he was not disturbed until he had had his sleep out, and that he got a good breakfast on waking. Then she went to her herself, and slept very soundly until noon.

She did not forget the little Italian. That day she gave orders that he should have a complete new suit, and scrubbed, have his hair cropped and cut, and have a suit of new clothes, and that a bed should be made up for him.

She had a little son with him; but I was clear, she thought, that while she was making up her mind the boy must have clothes to wear, and food to eat, and a bed to sleep in. One thing was certain—she would not turn him into the street to sleep on door-steps again.

The Hon. MRS. Milner, it should be said, was not on terms of the most cordial affection with her husband, the Hon. Charles Milner, who, for all his rank and his prospective title, was a good deal of what Dundreary called "a fast man." He was a man of low tastes, given to horses and prize-fighters and confrères of disastrous, where the actresses were of the "Black Crook" or Biche aux Bois school. MRS. Milner married him, at the direction of her parents, when she was too young to think for herself, or to form any opinion as to her own or any body else's character. They never had been happy together; now they were trying—and he was successful in the effort—to be happy separately. They never had any open quarrel, and were generally supposed to get on well enough. MR. Milner was now at Newmarket, and now at Doncaster, and now at Baden-Baden, and his wife was seldom troubled with his society. He had a seat in the House of Commons, and he went and voted in all the important party divisions, spending the night, when he had to wait long to give his vote, in the smoking-room of the House, and drinking a good deal of brandy-and-water. But he was not very happy even in the smoking-room of the House. His highest idea of happiness was to be surrounded by a throng of vulgar, admiring boon companions, of both sexes, who looked up to him, and were proud to do him homage.

MRS. Milner had had two children, of whom only the younger—a girl—was now living. The boy had died when a mere infant. Perhaps it was some thought of him—some thought that if he were alive he would now be about the same age as the lad asleep on her door-step—that first aroused in the breast of the lady of fashion a feeling of pity for the little Italian, and a wish to do something for him.

However that might be, she kept little Felice Morra under her care, and would not turn him out on the world. She set him down to one of her country seats for a time, and he came back to London strong, healthy, and happy. The child had a beautiful voice, and she had him taught to sing, and would play for him on the piano herself, and she began to take a positive pleasure in his affection and devotion. He was a sort of page for her, and a play-fellow for her little girl, who now some two or three years younger than he. The servants in the house debated whether he came into the family, and were a muttered oath or two sometimes when he saw the boy. But then he did not often see him, and he was not generally too much occupied with ASCOT, EPSOM, the prize-ring, and the ballet to trouble himself much with the existence of a poor harmless boy. If it had been a pretty orphan girl, now! . . . But in that case MRS. Milner would probably not have taken such a charge into her household.

Years brought difficulties. MRS. Milner had been long deciding on the proper occupation to which Felice Morra should be put that he was actually growing to be a young man without any occupation at all. The education he had was only what he had acquired from reading aloud to MRS. Milner any book or magazine or newspaper she wished to have read to her—and she did, indeed, keep him pretty constantly occupied in this way—and from occasionally writing letters for her. He was a delightful singer, at her dictation. He was a delightful singer, with a clear, full, sweet tenor voice; he could play the piano well, and, indeed, had a great natural gift of music. One might have called him MRS. Milner's secretary, perhaps, now that he could no longer be called her page; but his position in the household was beginning to be more anomalous and inconvenient every day. MRS. Milner, indeed, was always resolving that something must be done with him; but she never could make up her mind as to what should be done. In the poor lad had twined himself closely round her heart. She was not a happy woman. Years had made her husband more and herself more lonely; and had also made the poor outcast boy more like the son whom she had lost.

Felice had, indeed, her daughter, a beautiful girl somewhat like herself, but the heart of a woman dearly loved her daughter, but the heart of a woman is always unsatisfied if it has nothing manly to love; and MRS. Milner had no husband and no son, and was not a happy wife. She looked forward with dread to the sending of her young protégé away into the cold outer world; and yet she now avoided him as much as she could. Her husband had of late begun to grumble and swear at the poor young man, and used to make it a point to insult him whenever the two chanced to meet. Things could not long go on thus. Indeed, only for the extraordinary gentleness and patience of Felice Morra, reminding one of a Bengalee rather than an Italian, a rupture must have taken place long ago. But Felice bore all with a quiet, docile endurance which observers might have mistaken for apathy. MRS. Milner long felt convinced he bore all for her sake, not to disturb or distress her, not to leave her. She pitied and loved him all the more. She came to see, however, that she was mistaken. For it became at last only too apparent that the Italian outcast was passionately in love with Linda Milner, his patroness's daughter.

Now this was surely, one might have thought, a thing to be dreaded, guarded against, foreseen, expected, by any rational woman: yet MRS. Milner, who was ordinarily a very rational woman, never had thought of this. The child, Linda, had always appeared such a child to her!

One day—it was in the country—MRS. Milner came down to breakfast a little late, and her daughter was not in the breakfast-room. She looked out upon the lawn, and Linda was not there; then from another window into a little shrubbery, and there she saw something which made her flush rare red, and then pale.

She saw Linda Milner and the young Italian walking slowly up and down, apparently conversing in low tones. They were walking, one might perhaps have said, just as any two acquaintances might walk; but MRS. Milner did not think so. Ah, no! There was something in the attitude of both—of the one who walked with downcast eyes and an indescribable air of timidity, and yet earnestness; of him, as he leaned toward her and looked down upon her—which spoke only too plainly to MRS. Milner.

These two who walked there were lovers! And MRS. Milner herself had brought this about; and only think how Linda's father would receive the news! And his daughter had fallen in love with an Italian beggar, who was picked up, when a child, at a door-step!

Presently she saw Felice Morra take Linda's hand in his and press it to his lips, and then the two parted, and Linda, "like a lapwing," ran across the lawn and soon entered the breakfast-room.

MRS. Milner could not and would not keep back her feelings.

"Linda, you have made me miserable! I have seen all!"

Linda was a proud girl, long trained to self-will. She said, coldly:

"All what, mamma?"

"I saw you walking with Felice, and I saw your manner toward each other. For shame, Linda! He is in love with you!"

"He is, mamma."

"Has he told you so?"

"Yes, dear mamma."

The composure of her demeanor quite bewildered Mrs. Milner.

"Then what did you say, girl, when he told you this?"

"Ah—nothing."

"And at last?" asked MRS. Milner, striving, not very effectively, to imitate the composure of her daughter.

"At last—well, I told him the truth when he pressed me for an answer."

"Then you have the courage to tell me that you love him?"

"I have told you so, mamma; but it is true!"

"And you dare to think of marrying him?"

"Indeed I do."

"Have you thought of what your father would say?"

"I have thought of it, dear mother; but it can not change my love. I love him, and I will love him long for him."

"Do you know what he is—what he was?"

"Yes, mamma; I know all about it. But I know, too, that you have made him your companion and mine so long as I can remember, and I do not choose him for a companion; I do choose him for a husband."

MRS. Milner tried expostulation, argument, tears, prayers, threats—she was not very good at threats, poor woman!—but she could make no impression on her daughter. MRS. Milner was miserably unhappy. Despite all she had done to keep matters quiet, despite her genuine affection for her whole soul revolted at the idea of his marrying her daughter. Nobody needs to be told what the feeling of caste is in the English aristocracy.

This was one of the kindest of women, she had done for this youth what one woman with ten thousand would have done; she was strongly attached to him, and only yesterday had been wondering how she could bear to part from him; and yet she was positively unable to restore to her mind the possibility of such a fantastic calamity as his marrying her daughter. After all, she felt very much as a benevolent Georgian lady might have felt who suddenly learned that the slave boy she had specially favored and petted had stolen her daughter's heart.

Moreover, Mrs. Milner was, in some respects, a timid woman. She shrank from scenes and disturbances and even sudden changes; and she dreaded the outburst of her husband's anger when the wedding story should come to his ears.

"Leave her!" he said, bitterly. "Leave her although she loves me, in order that she may marry some one whom she does not love! In order that she may marry some one of my own rank! Ah, God! Mrs. Milner, you can tell whether to marry in one's own class is always happiness!"

Mrs. Milner grimaced. "It is not always happiness, indeed, Felice; but to marry one out of one's rank is never happiness, except for very, very rarely constituted beings. My poor boy, listen to me. I know my daughter. I know that the nature that could rise superior to the difficulties and pains of such a position as you would bring her to. I think, perhaps, I could have done it. I know she could not. Write her a few lines. Tell her, frankly, that you do not think it right or honest or for her happiness to continue near her, or to look for her final plighted engagement, and go. She will forget you. For me, I am sorry to destroy your first romance; but I know my daughter, and she will forget you."

The poor youth groaned in agony. There was something unmanful in his nature, and he seemed now like a fine woman with her heart on fire. Mrs. Milner pressed him again and again, appealing, above all, to his sense of gratitude and the memory of all she had done for him.

"Oh, Mrs. Milner, I only wish to Heaven," he exclaimed at last, "I had you left me your door-step, and that I had died there!"

But she was obdurate, and he was obdured. He wrote his few farewell lines; and he left that very day the house which had sheltered him so long. His banker endeavored to induce him to take some money. She offered him enough to make a gentleman's start in life for any youth, but he only begged of her to spare him this. When she continued to press him with her untimely and futile kindness he broke into a storm of grief of pressure she had ever seen him give way to. He rose terrified her by his sudden and electric vehemence of his anger; and he left the house without even a farewell pressure of her hand.

He made his way to London, and straggled about there helpless and wretched as a cannybred under one of his gilded cage to make their northern forests. He suffered immense, unspeakable misery. So far as the Milner family was concerned, he seemed to have wholly disappeared.

Mrs. Milner was right. In a few months Linda had nearly forgotten him, or was at least so free of her love engagement with him. Yes a little, and she was to be married to the son and heir of an earl—a handsome, youthful, brilliant lover, whom, indeed, she loved.

The time came, the wedding took place. In the crowd who watched it was one haggard, ghastly, stricken wretch, with burning eyes and trembling lips, whom hardly any body noticed, and who remained in the church, his head buried in his hands, after every one had left, until the genteel sexton turned him out at last.

The bride and bridegroom started for the Continent. Mrs. Milner went to her home in Kent.

She did not remain long, but left almost before the guests had ceased to arrive. She was sad and lonely. She had fancied, somehow, that in the crowd at the church there was a face which for a moment reminded her of poor Felice Morris; but there was nothing in that, for she was always thinking poor thing she saw faces reminding her of his. She wondered where he was, and whether he had got over his grief, and whether he was prospering, and had forgotten her. She did not dare to allow herself to consider the other possibilities that he was not prospering, and that he had not forgotten his grief, that he was poor and miserable. She kept saying to herself that she had acted for the best; that she had done right; that she could not have done otherwise; that she was bound to secure her daughter's happiness; that she had secured it. Thus thinking, she sat in her carriage, she reached her own door.

There was a slight delay or difficulty or confusion of some kind among the footmen at the door and no one appeared who opened it. Mrs. Milner could not help thinking of the summer morning when she found poor Felice Morris asleep on the door-step.

What were the men about? She thought she heard half-suppressed exclamations and expressions of wonder. She got out of the carriage. The servants were certainly removing some obstruction from the doorway. With a sinking heart and a sickening presentiment of something terrible to happen, Mrs. Milner eagerly pressed forward. The men were lifting a body from the door-step, and they turned to her with awe-stricken faces. One glance at the burden they bore was enough for her. It was the body of poor Felice Morris, and he was dead. He had dragged his exhausted frame to the door-step where, years ago, a poor vagrant boy, he was found by her, his only parentless. And there he had lain down and died.

Linda never knew the fate of her hapless lover. Mrs. Milner kept that sad secret, an abiding agony, in her own heart.

THE WATCH ON THE RHINE.

We give below the most spirited, as well as the most faithful, translation of this celebrated German war song which has yet appeared in English. It was made expressly for Harper's Weekly:

A voice resounds like thunder-peal,
Mid sterling waves and clang of steel,
"The Rhine! the Rhine! the German Rhine!
Who guards to-day my country's shrine?"
Dear Father-land! No danger thine!
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

They stand, a hundred thousand strong,
Quick to avenge their country's wrong;
With filial love their breasts are filled,
They'll guard the sacred landmark well.
Dear Father-land! No danger thine!
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

And though in death our hopes decay,
The Rhine will win a glorious way;
For rich with water as its flood
Is Germany with hero blood.
Dear Father-land! No danger thine!
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

From you blue sky are bending now
The hero-bead to hear our vow?
As long as German hearts are free
The Rhine, the Rhine, shall German be.
Dear Father-land! No danger thine!
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

"While dear ones drop of German blood,
Or sword remains to guard thy flood,
While rifle rests in patriot hand,
No foe shall tread thy sacred strand."
Dear Father-land! No danger thine!
Firm stand our sons to watch the Rhine.

Our oath resounds: the river flows;
In golden light our banner glows;
Our heart will be our German divine:
The Rhine! the Rhine! the German Rhine!
Dear Father-land! No danger thine!
Firm stand thy sons to watch the Rhine.

THE SIMPLE SCHOOL OF NOVELS.

THE simple school of novels is a born native of England. Fielding, Richardson, Goldsmith, Wolfe, Miss Burney, Jane Austen—all these are claimed as representatives of the simple school; and in various since stories of simple telling have prevailed have been wanting enough of Gallic charm to prove and satisfy the national taste.

Love is more or less the burden of all novels; but it is interesting to note how different a figure love is to play and that is said to hold in the pages of simple novelists from that played by him in those of their fast and sensational competitors. As a matter of course, love does not run smooth here any more than elsewhere; but its even current is not disturbed by the occurrence of passion, or by the breaking down of the restraints of duty, with too many or a husband too few is not with the simple school the object the united bliss. Novels of the sensational school have accustomed us to the occurrence of tremendous fellows with herculean limbs, killing glances, and withering smiles, and by whose very presence the hearts of women are made to quail; the Volscians were fluttered at Corioli by the apparition of Coriolanus. The usual cause of their heart is that of a volcano apparently quiet, but in reality boiling, burning, and seething within, and periodically manifesting its terrible neighbors with the scorching lava of an unexpected passion eruption. The simple school of the hero is a much less formidable and distinguished personage. It is perhaps a slight drawback to his dignity that he is not subject to fits of passion; but then he has the advantage of resembling, in that as in other particulars, the average run of our own experience. Far from having, like the overpowering hero we have just been considering, a pair to fall of at the feet that the retrospect, as in the case of the fugitives from the doomed cities of Sodom, is positively petrifying, he is usually, when first introduced to our notice, as bashful before a petticoat as a coute de baton laws always. We are supposed given to understand not only that he is (as Thackeray and every reviewer thinks her own son) a Joseph, but that he has yet been tempted. His heart has not been injured even to the extent that would be implied by a single flirtation, much less by an attempt to a score of boyish fancies. His affections are fresh and unworn when he consecrates to the heroine his first passion. Her sex has, in the words of one of our simple novelists, to know, cut off thereby worshiped mistress by the zenith of her maddening beauty—we trust that we have correctly rendered the meaning of these imposing expressions—or flings her, ardently reluctant, into the rival embraces of some accomplished gentleman—he, like a statue of the lightning, stands immovable. He bears a laden breast; but the only sigh by which you ever know that the simoom has swept over and scorched him are that he smokes perpetually in somber silence from clubhouses of fabulous rarity filled with tobacco that never gets into the market, and that he loses or wins his money at vingt et un as calmly as though he were blowing soap-bubbles. Not so our simple hero. If he loses at play, it is with a sinking heart, and his heart beats thick and fast. If she seems to be coquetting with some other swain, he is ready to make away with himself in desperation. If he finds Jack up a little hair chain that has been on her person, he carries it away with him, and wears it next his heart until he can place them in a sweeter substitute—herself. The heroine of simple novels is a companion picture. She stands as near to the risk of drowning herself in the nearest pond or hanging herself on the nearest tree as of sitting on the grass under an umbrageous beech, after the fashion of a fair heroine, with a blue-eyed stranger she meets for the second time, with whom she has never been formally introduced. What Francesca da Rimini terms La prima radice del amor strikes into the heart very deeply and far more slowly. Only by fine gradations does she come to associate the presence of her lover with an undefined feeling of happiness, and to discover her own secret by noticing that she is more particular about her personal appearance when she hears him approaching. The scene in which the hero proposes and is accepted, or rejected, or told to wait, as the case may be, is marked by the same absence of passion and exaggeration, and the same deference to propriety and human nature. The most natural of all the simple novelists, with a fidelity to nature which is sometimes a little perilous, allows his hero to make a bigger fool of himself at that critical moment even than during the other portions of his undulating career; thinking, doubtless—and, to judge by success, thinking rightly—that the ludicrous figure he cuts will be overlooked by the reader on the principle of leges sevimus duraz peliginose viciatum. "Unhappy the man," says Mr. Thackeray, "who has not been a poet once in his life!" A simple novelist often seems to think that unhappy is the man who has not been a fool of himself once in his life. It is consoling to think that the vast majority of the readers of novels have been at least at least that one piece of felicity.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

ABOUT three miles from Cassel, the former capital of the electorate of Hesse-Cassel, stands Wilhelmshöhe, the castle of Wilhelmshöhe. It is situated on the top of a hill, and commands a fine view of the country around. The castle is built of white sandstone, and consists of a large square, with a massive building on each side. A flight of stairs leads from the court directly into a beautiful and picturesque garden. Wilhelmshöhe was built about 1785 by the Elector Hesse, and there he died; but his son and heir was driven from Cassel by Napoleon, who made it the capital of the Westphalian kingdom, and gave it to his brother Jerome. Jerome Napoleon, however, was forced to leave it, in consequence of the reigning events in 1813. Political disturbances caused the reigning Elector to flee in 1848, and, though he was afterward restored, Prussia took possession of Hesse-Cassel in 1866, in consequence of the Elector siding with Austria in the German-Italian war. Since that time Wilhelmshöhe Castle has not been used. But now the late Emperor of the French, Napoleon III., is to live there. Cassel by-the-by, is a place of large number of attendants. How long he will remain there is uncertain, but very likely until a settlement is made between France and Prussia.

Nearly two hundred horses can now be accommodated upon the racing-grounds at Jerome Park. The stand is in French composition by Hellbert, and embraces a great variety of races, and it is said that almost every race-course in the United States and Canada will be present.

We have seen it stated that the last sale of a slave in the South occurred in Virginia, under the following circumstances: The slave had just come of the retiring of Lee's army, when a gentleman offered a slave to a farmer of Albemarle county. After a considerable bargaining on both sides the negro was sold for one hundred dollars in gold.

Common petroleum, rubbed over the face and hands, is said to answer every purpose of a mosquito net. We should suppose it would!

Barracuda, a plant indigenous in the northern part of the United States, is considered by many physicians a sovereign remedy for varicloid and small-pox. This valuable plant is said to grow in the swamps of Nova Scotia, and at the proper season the root is gathered and preserved for use. The Journal of Applied Chemistry says that no other medicine reaches the disease in the first stage of vaccination. That succulus digestive is a solid matter of all contagious properties; and that, however numerous the eruptions on the body of a patient, there is need for but one scar left. This plant is often used as a preventive. But here a grand query arises: Can it take a scar from the disease? If it cannot. Cannot somebody thoroughly investigate the subject?

One dark night, not long ago, a burglar entered a private residence in South Avenue. On ascending one flight of stairs he observed a light in a chamber, and, while standing what to do, a large woman suddenly descended upon him from above. She seized the burglar, slid him through the hall, and pushed him into the street before he had time to think. "Heroic daughter of a Burglar by a Woman," was the way the story appeared in the morning journal. The woman friends called, and congratulated her upon her courage, she declined it, saying, "Indeed I didn't know it was a burglar. If I had I should have been frightened half to death. I thought it was my husband come home drunk again, and I was determined he shouldn't stay in the house in that condition."

Another woman, living in Pittsburg, heroically came to the rescue of her husband in this wise. The latter had been arrested on suspicion that he had made a violent assault upon another man. He had a broken head, and the evidence was strong against him. But this woman that she herself inflicted the wound in her head with a poker! So the magistrate could only discharge the husband from custody.

Rubens, the celebrated painter, was evidently possessed of warm affections and a domestic character, if we are to judge at all by the numerous pictures he left of his wives and children. He seems to have delighted in quadripping and varying these beloved objects under every possible aspect. Even the portraits by him of his first wife, Isabella Brant, still exist, and no less than eighteen known portraits and sketches of his second wife, Helena Formans. He was married to his first wife in 1609, and from every account she was his faithful companion. She left him two sons, and he greatly deplored her loss. Several years after her death he married again. At the time he was in his fifty-fourth year, and his bride, Helena, scarcely sixteen. The extraordinary liberty and modesty of the young girl awakened a strong love and admiration in the heart of the artist, which sensation unchallenged till his death. By her he had five children. Rubens's first wife, also, was interested to have been very handsome.

Marshal M'Mahon wrote to his wife, after the battle of Wurth, a touching account of the day, and its certain his position. Yet it is in the language of a hero. He was then commander of Prussian Army commanded him, and of the heroism of his soldiers. He said that, in despite of a gushing, irrepressible sentiment and utter astonishment, he sought for death, but the bullets would not have him.

Each war of modern years has brought into prominence one particular mode of attack or defense. The Crimean war (1854-1856) demonstrated the utility of rifled cannon. The Indian war (1857) brought rifled cannon into prominence. The American war (1861-1865) established the use of torpedoes. The Austro-Prussian war (1866) showed the potency of the needle-gun; and the Franco-Prussian war of 1870 has established the use of mitrailleuse.

Count Bismarck's two sons took part in the battles before Metz. One of them was wounded; the other had his horse shot under him.

Hippophagy has received a fresh impulse from the war. Butchers find the battle-field a good place to buy horses which were never intended for a market.

Some time ago two ladies happened to occupy the same seat in a car from Baltimore. One was dressed, to put it mildly, unassuming; the other, fancy and overdressed. There was a violent storm prevailing, and the lady remarked that it was a trying time for soiling dress along the cars.

"Yes, I know it is," effectedly responded the other lady. "I know all about those wet coal-combustions."

"Ah! you've had some experience personally, I suppose?" queried the first lady.

"You may well say that, ma'am. Why, bless you! my husband's a Railroad Conductor! Prevail, is Capin of Chuckey Bay. He used to be Captin of Choptank, Christiana, Brandywine, and dich like creeks; but he's got a Railroad Conductorship now, and runs on the Harrisburg now. I guess, likely, maybe, your husband is a sailor too, ain't he?"

"Yes, my husband is a sailor."

"Well, I declare! you look just like a sailor's wife. Is your husband a captin?"

"No, not at present."

"Mate?"

"No, ma'am."

"Sailor 'fore the mast?"

"No."

"Why'd, now, that's strange! Not a captin, nor mate, nor fore the mast! Why, marm, what does your husband do?"

"He commands a fleet at present, I believe."

"Admiral, then? Why, who may your husband be, marm?"

"Admiral Porter, ma'am."

"Mrs. Captin John Francis!" suddenly exhibited into indignifiance.

An "old folks" party at Mystic River, Connecticut, was composed of fifteen persons whose united ages were 1,340 years. The oldest was ninety-two, the youngest was sixty-one. At a little village in Pennsylvania, recently, five ladies took tea together, whose united ages were four hundred and twenty-five years.

Brigham Young proposes to abolish Mormonism, provided the United States will pass laws compelling every man to marry seventeen women, or else to interfere with his neighbor's wife, or with angry women.

The following conversation is given in the Paris en Orient, as having taken place in the commission ordered to inspect the plan of the erection of war, before it was submitted to the Chambers:

M. De Rochefort.—"Marshal, are we ready?"

M. Lebeuf.—"Quite ready."

M. De Rochefort.—"Will you pledge your word of honor that we shall not a crisis in which the foreign France into war, without having foreseen and provided for every thing?"

M. Lebeuf.—"I give you my word of honor that we have foreseen everything."

M. De Cassagnac.—"One word more. What do you think of the Prussian needle-gun?"

M. Lebeuf (authoritatively). "I mean by them that if the war were to last a year, we should not have to buy a bullet in Germany."

"Miss and Wife," Winkle Collins's latest novel, has been dramatized by the author for the London stage, and will be produced at once. Miss Braddon's new novel has been for a long time a successful writer of plays. In connection with Dickens and Fechter he dramatized "Hunted Down" and "No Thoroughfare," which was put on the stage, by Fechter, at the Adelphi Theatre.

Near Carrollton, Arkansas, excavations have been recently made in an Indian mound, several twenty-five feet high, and about an acre in area at the top. The result has been the discovery of some curious relics of flint and ten feet in height. Surely there "were giants in those days" as long gone by!

A jeweler of Saratoga has in his possession a rare trinket, especially valuable from having once been the property of the Empress Carlotta. It is a lady's watch and chain, intended to be worn pendent from the neck like a locket. The face of the watch is plain within the reverse side, which is designed to be worn outward, is set in a beautiful lapis lazuli, encircled with diamonds, and on the back is a cipher in raised letter of in German text, richly studded with brilliants. The chain is heavy, containing six large links of blue lapis lazuli, with intermediate links of gold, set with diamonds.

CARING FOR THE WOUNDED.

THE German armies are not only admirably organized for fighting, but for the operations of every department of the art of war. • Their officers are communicate topographers, and while Parisians have been shouting "A Berlin!" they have been diligently poring over maps till they are cognizant of every mountain track which might be supposed to be known only to the local goatherds. Carefully, too, have they studied the gazetteer of France; for they know exactly ravens. But now there is an organized corps of grave-diggers, while the red crosses which distinguish the bearers of the wounded, and the black and white dresses of the Sisters of Mercy, convey the aspect of a procession of pilgrims approaching a holy shrine rather than of soldiers invading a hostile country. Of the Krankentrager (bearers of the sick) some are men of the Landwehr, others are students from the hospitals and universities in plain clothes. All display the red cross, stamped on a white cloth, which is tied round the left arm. Nor is the picted in the engraving on this page, who tend the wounded without distinction of nationality.

As a further illustration of this tenderness for the wounded, we give on page 612 a sketch of the removal of wounded French prisoners from the battle-field of Worth, escorted by a detachment of Bavarian soldiers. A private letter, written from Hagenau soon after that battle, says: "Nearly every house and stable at Weissenburg is full of wounded, as are also all the villages round about, and a large number of wooden sheds have been erected as temporary could easily be seen. In the majority of cases they had received bullet-wounds in the feet or legs, and dragged their slow way along in agony at every step. Let Prussia boast—for she can truthfully do so, and it is a matter of which a nation may indeed be proud—that, the fight once over, friend and enemy are treated alike, and nothing is spared to ease the suffering, to soften the miseries of the wounded foe. Nor are instances of individual kindness wanting. I noticed the Prussian soldiers helping the poor crippled men along, and carrying in their arms those who how many horses every village between Metz and Paris is capable of stabling. They lay down extempore railways and extempore electric telegraphs; and if the enemy destroy bridges, they carry beams of just the right length to supply the place of the shattered edifice. In every thing their foresight appears pre-eminent. Especially is this visible in the department which attends to the victims of the strife. In former days the wounded were left to chance succor, while the dead were buried either by the forced labor of reluctant peasants, or left to the eagles and the service devoid of danger. Recently a nun, while tending the wounded, had both of her legs carried off by a cannon-ball; and at the battle of Thionville, says a Prussian dispatch, the French fired—it is to be hoped in ignorance—both on surgeons and ambulances. Besides the Sisters of Mercy in black and white, there is a corps of Sisters who wear dark slate-colored dresses and white boots. But there are also, it is to be hoped, every where where woman is to be found, amateur Sisters of Mercy of the old-fashioned unorganized sort, such as the peasant girls de-hospitals outside the town. Here also, at Hagenau, the red cross floats from nearly every window. A number of poor fellows, chiefly Turcos and Zouaves, arrived here this evening. It was pitiable, indeed sickening, to watch them crawling painfully through the streets. They offered, in truth, a shocking spectacle—their heads bound up in dirty cloths, their gay uniforms smirched with mud, and in many instances covered with blood. They had thrown away knapsacks, and even boots and clothes, in the flight, and looked as pitiable a set of men as seemed too faint to walk. Others pressed upon them cigars, which were eagerly accepted, and even money, with which, goodness knows, the donors could ill afford to part. All honor to the gallant fellows who show such a noble spirit, and who, the fight once over, can be as tender and kindly compassionate as women toward the suffering and the poor! These instances of true charity all occurred, so far as I witnessed, among the private soldiers; the officers, perhaps too busy to attend to such trifles, passed by on the other side."

THE BRITISH IRON-CLAD "CAPTAIN," LOST SEPTEMBER 6TH OFF CAPE FINISTERRE.

THE LOSS OF THE "CAPTAIN."

We give on this page a sketch of the new British iron-clad ship of war the Captain, which recently foundered off the coast of France in a heavy gale, carrying down with her all but eighteen of her crew of five hundred men. The Captain had two large turrets placed amidships, in each of which were mounted two 25-ton rifled guns, throwing a solid elongated projectile of 600 pounds, or a shell of proportionate weight; and in the forecastle and poop there were two or three bow guns and stern-chasers of smaller calibre. Full ship-rigged, with two independent screws, engines of extraordinary power, steering apparatus of curious perfection, and every modern improvement which has ever been found of value in the equipment of a ship of war, the Captain was considered one of the most magnificent specimens of naval architecture afloat. The thickness of her plating varied from six to ten inches. On her first trial-trip, last July, she behaved admirably in a heavy gale. The cause of her foundering in a gale which other ships easily weathered is yet unknown, but will probably be ascertained from some of those who were so fortunate as to survive the disaster. The captain and Captain COLES, who claimed to be the originator of the turret system, were among those who were lost.

STEAMERS LAID UP AT BREMEN.

THE effect of the war upon German commerce is shown in the engraving of the Bremen docks, on this page, where a large number of ships and steamers are now lying idle, having been withdrawn from the seas to secure them against capture by French cruisers. A correspondent who visited Bremen a short time ago thus describes the appearance of the city since the commencement of hostilities: "Bremen was formerly a fortified town, with huge ramparts, glacis, and mounts. These have all been destroyed; nearly and counterscarp have disappeared, and all vestiges of the forms of the military works have been obliterated by the skill of the landscape-gardener. The abrupt slopes have been planted with ornamental trees, and the mounts made into picturesque, many-shaped pools and canals, at times almost lost among the rich foliage on the banks, or else opening out into broad sheets of water covered with water-fowl. Round the ornamental grounds thus formed are built the villas of the wealthy merchants of the city. Bremen is famed all over Germany for the wealth of its inhabitants and the pride and exclusiveness of the principal merchants. The villas that surround the ornamental ground are of all sizes and styles; some are palaces, suitable only for a merchant prince; others are exceedingly neat, but all are built in the most perfect manner, and with the most refined taste. The prevailing style is classical, leaning rather to the Greek than to the Roman. It is many years since the fortifications of Bremen were destroyed, and the ground planted, so that the timber is fine and well grown. This suburb of Bremen is more like what one would expect to find—what we do not find, in some fine old Italian city on the shore of the Mediterranean, and especially one which never ceases to be within a few miles of the shores of the cold North Sea.

"Bremen has at present in it more than 18,000 troops, who are quartered in all the hotels and many private houses. The consequence is a terrible—at times, even fiend-like body of men, who look as if they would fight most certainly, but seem not to be pleased at being dragged from their homes, their families, and their peaceful occupations by this war. They appear bearing all unexceptionally good; they do not look smart, and there is no pipe-clay, yet they seem precisely the class of men an officer would like to have behind him, for they are safe to follow where he leads, or stand and die where he bids them. They are not to fight for the father-land, but they desire to know no more. On this question Germany seems to have but one heart."

SLEEP.

SHELLEY begins that beautiful rhapsody of his, "Queen Mab," with the lines:

"How wonderful is Death, Death and his brother Sleep."

Allegory is a dangerous edge-tool, and very apt to snap in the hands of the workman. But the poetical impressionism should be shown quickly, then instantly withdrawn. No inquiry should be made into its antecedents or its future. It is a beautiful allegory to call Death the brother of Sleep, but what would you say if you were told who was Sleep's third cousin, or his aunt, or his grandmother, or his godfather?

Sleep is the holiday time of life, as death is the final breaking up. During half man's life the shop is closed and the shutters are up. He needs forgetfulness half his life to enable him to endure the other half. Shak-speare, who has written nearly about most things, has written very nobly on sleep. Witness that grand passage in "Macbeth," so full of all his faults and all his beauties:

"Sleep that knits up the ravell'd sleave of care,
The death of each day's life, sore labour's bath,
Balm of hurt minds, great nature's second course,
Chief nourisher in life's feast."

What a prodigality and even confusion of metaphors! Sleep a dancer, a death, a bath, a balsam, a second course, a chief dish, and all in four lines! Shakspeare was fond of contrasting troubled rovalty with contented poverty. The antithesis often occurs in his writings. Thus, in "Henry the Fourth," the Prince says:

"Sleep with it now!
Yet not so sound and half so deeply sweet
As he whose brow with homely biggin bound
Snores out the watch of night."

Boerhaave tells a story of a cranky German physician, who maintained that sleep was the natural state of man, and that to be awake was to be in a state of disease, under which term all the Teutonic stormhouse eventually slept himself into an apoplexy.

What is sleep? you ask the doctors and the physiologists, and, as usual, they tell you the symptoms and results of sleep, and diagnose its diagnosis, but help you no further. In fact, all they know about it is that it is. Blumenbach attributed it to a diminished flow of arterial blood to the brain, but Dr. Elliotson, his commentator, justly remarks that this is mere circumlation is a consequence, not a cause, of sleep. Pressure on the brain produces involuntary sleep, but nevertheless, there must be some primarily be pressure in true and natural sleep. Here, again, we arrive at one of nature's closed doors.

The writer on sleep have noted several of its phenomena. At the battle of the Nile some of the ships' boys, worn out with fighting, fell asleep at the foot of the guns that were for a moment ceasing their remorseless fire. Those brave men so accustomed to the din of forges and the noise of mills that they could not sleep in quiet places. During the retreat from Corunna, the soldiers were often seen marching fast asleep. Some great men, like Napoleon, have been able to sleep at will. Sir Walter Scott always said he required seven hours' sleep to refresh his huge brain. Sir Edward Coke used to say, in the words of a quotation from Alcæus, of which he was fond:

"Six hours in sleep, in law's grave study six,
Four spend in prayer, the rest on nature fix."

But Sir William Jones took a less ascetic view of life when he wrote his paraphrase:

"Seven hours to law, to soothing slumber seven;
Nine to the world allot, and all to Heaven."

The robust and ungullant old proverb has it, "Five hours for a man, seven for a woman, and seven for a fool;" but life was slower and less exhaustive than it is now when that proverb was written.

Keats wrote well when he said:

"O magic sleep! O comfortable bird,
That broodest o'er the troubled sea of the mind
Till ail is hushed and smooth."

But, after all the poets' fine sayings, there is a single sentence of Cervantes that, in my estimation, beats them all. He puts it in the mouth of that jovial materialist, Sancho:

"Now blessings on him that first invented sleep! it covers a man all over, thoughts and all, like a cloak; it is meat for the hungry, drink for the thirsty, heat for the cold, and cold for the heat."

Young, in his "Night Thoughts," assumes a depreciatory air and insinuates that as a mere paltry time-server in these five smooth lines:

"Tired Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep,
He, like the world, his ready visits pays
Where Fortune smiles; the wretched he forsakes;
Swift on his downy pinions flies from woe,
And visits his unsullied by a tear."

Some old verse of the Elizabethan Church broke forth in one of his sermons into quaint conjectures as to Adam's feelings when his first wife appeared from his side. It must have been like dissolution, a falling away into the chaos from whence at God's fiat he had emerged. Poet Coleridge has a fine sonnet on the subject of what awoke Adam from his first sleep, but we prefer to quote a quaint old writer:

"What was't awakened first the unlived ear
Of that rude man, who, in the primal kind
Unconscious, welcome of the wind,
Hurrying the trees that never more were?
The four melodious streams which flowed so near,
Their lulling murmurs all in one confused?
The note of bird unnamed? The startled hind Bounding the lonely wild? Or, first in fear,
Of her new bed? or did the holy ground
Send forth some gentle music? Or the grass
The gracious pressure of innocuous feet?
Did viewless seraphim his mind unbind,
Making sweet music out of air as sweet,
Or his own voice first startle him to sound?"

The poets have written their best in their comparisons of death and sleep.

"Stoop the sleep that knows not breaking, Morn of toil, nor night of waking," writes Scott; but the old Jesuit poet, Crashaw, uses the word with ineffably more tenderness and a deeper feeling in his beautiful elegy on two lovers:

"In not weep.
Peace! the lovers are asleep.
They, sweet turtles! folded lie
In the last knot that love could tie.
Let them sleep, let them sleep on,
Till this stormy night be gone,
And the eternal morning dawn;
Then the curtains will be drawn,
And they wake with that light
Whereby day shall never sleep in night."

THE AMERICAN BROILER.

(Pat. July 21, 1868, and Oct. 18, 1870.)

THE FINEST CULINARY INVENTION OF THE AGE.

Embodying in a plain and cheap utensil ALL THE PRINCIPLES INVOLVED IN THE PERFECT BROILING OF MEATS.

Operates upon the essential natural principles for broiling meats to perfection; prevents the escape of nutriment by evaporation, and retains all the rich juices and delicate flavor—which are mostly lost in all other broilers, or by the process of FRYING.

Broils in less than half the time required by any other, and cooks the most perfectly uniform, leaving no burned or raw spots.

Does away with all smoke and smell of grease, incurs no preparation of fire; and requires no broiling, heretofore so vexatious, the QUICKEST and EASIEST, as it is the HEALTHIEST of all MODES OF COOKING MEATS.

Broils equally well over coal or wood; answers for all sized stove or range openings; and is equally good for BEEF-STEAK, CHICKEN, HAM, CHOP, FISH, or OYSTERS.

It is not only

to fulfill each and every claim above set forth, but to any not satisfied after trial,

THE MONEY WILL BE REFUNDED, WITH CHARGES BOTH WAYS.

Each Broiler will have the authorized label attached, with the trade-mark, "American Broiler," stamped thereon.

MACGREGOR'S

Rob Roy on the Jordan.

The Rob Roy on the Jordan, Nile, Red Sea, and Gennesareth, &c. A Canoe Cruise in Palestine and Egypt, and the Waters of Damascus. By J. MACGREGOR, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

The "Rob Roy" is a canoe in which Mr. Macgregor had paddled his way over the lakes and rivers of many lands, and in which, a few months ago, he journeyed through the Suez Canal and followed the course of the Jordan, by reason of the light draught of its little vessel penetrating to spots heretofore never visited by European. Mr. Macgregor wields the pen as lightly as he paddle, and narrates his adventures in a style that does not often weary.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The trip on the Jordan, from its sources to its mouth, is especially full of interest and charm to the Christian reader. The work will supplement our knowledge of the lands visited in many important particulars, and will convey an idea of the waters of Palestine with more minute distinctness than any previously published. It is charmingly written, abounds in incidents, and is enriched with maps and numerous fine illustrations.—Sunday-School Times.

Always sprightly, a good story-teller, and actually having much that is worth narrating, he has really contributed not a little to this interesting volume to our stock of information with several localities in Syria.—Athenæum.

Mr. Macgregor finds a more entertaining book than this. The original and eccentric mode of traveling adopted by the author, his ludicrous and often ridiculous adventures, and the pleasant, racy style in which he writes, impart to these pages a veritable air of romance.—N. Y. Herald.

Exceedingly entertaining.—N. Y. Times.

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of and a comprehensive guide to all important events of the time. Due attention is also given to topics of especial interest to women. The best writers in the country are constantly engaged in the department of Illustration, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to private sources in all the large cities of America, Europe, and the East for prompt and valuable contributions.

As a Literary Journal, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the best. Its Serial and Short Stories have never succeeded in establishing and maintaining a higher standard.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in this country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

The Forty-first Volume of the Magazine closes with the November No. Its success hitherto—unrivaled by any publication of its class—has been due to the fact that it has always maintained a high standard of purity in all parts of its contents; to the enterprise of its Publishers in securing, at a large outlay, the best literary contributions of English and American writers; to the liberality with which it has met the demands of illustration; to the promptness, authenticity, and popular character of its summaries of the progress of science upon the mechanical improvements of the age, and upon matters relating to the useful and liberal arts; to its special Editorial Departments—to which recently a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record. The elements upon which the past success of the Magazine has been based will be carefully studied in the future, and the Publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of their readers they will be able to enhance even upon its present popularity.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any similar periodical issued in the English language. Thus the scope open at the disposal of its Publishers will enable them to furnish all of the topics considered in their pages.

No other instruments are so carefully "voiced" and tuned; and none can give at once such full and such delicate combinations of tone. Their sub-bass, in particular, whether manual or pedal, is unapproachable.

For these reasons the AMERICAN ORGAN satisfies the artistic as well as the practical ucrse.

ALBANY, March 24, 870.

T. M. AVERY, Esq.,
Pres't National Watch Co., Chicago:

Dear Sir,—In answer to your inquiries as to the Watch I have of your manufacture, I would say that I have carried it some four months, and find it a good, reliable time-keeper. The movements seem perfect in it runs regular, and I see no difference in its register of time whether I carry it about me in the office or when traveling by trains. I do not hesitate to recommend them as reliable Watches, with perfect works, running with great accuracy, and well adapted for use of railroad men or others that wish good Watches; besides, they are the production of our own country's mechanics, and that, together with their merit as time registers, should certainly give them preference over imported Watches, however good the reputation of foreign makers may be.

Yours truly, J. TILLINGHAST.

THE BALANCE-WHEEL

OF A

WALTHAM WATCH

BEATS

4 times a second,
240 times a minute,
14,400 times an hour,
345,600 times a day,
2,419,200 times a week,
10,368,000 times a month,
126,144,000 times a year.

MORE IS EXPECTED FROM A WATCH THAN ANY OTHER KIND OF MACHINERY.

It must not only run all day, but all night; not only on week days, but on Sundays and Holidays. It must run bumping up or lying down—upside down or right side up. It must keep running when the wearer sits down or stands up, when he walks or rides. In fact, it is expected to do its duty at all times, in every place, and in every position.

A GENUINE WALTHAM WATCH

will fulfill all these requirements. If wound once a day, it will faithfully tick for you a hundred and twenty-six million times in a year, without even requiring fresh oil all that time.

A GENUINE WALTHAM WATCH

CONTAINS

5 Springs, 9 Wheels, 51 Screws, and 94 other pieces, making altogether 163 separate pieces.

EVERY GENUINE WALTHAM WATCH HAS SEVEN JEWELS.

The Extra Jeweled have Eleven Jewels. The Full Jeweled have Fifteen Jewels.

Every part of a Waltham Watch is made by machinery. The machinery used in making the movement of a single Watch cost over a hundred thousand dollars; yet we sell these Watches in a solid-silver hunting case for $18. The same Watch could not be made by hand and finished as perfectly for ten times as much.

A GENUINE WALTHAM WATCH

is interchangeable, like a Springfield rifle—that is, any part of one Watch is exactly like the same part in another; and if the balance of one grade were taken apart, and the screws, wheels, springs, &c., were mixed together, ten Watches could be made by putting these parts together again without any reference to their former combination. This is a great advantage. For if any part of a Waltham Watch is injured, we can always replace it at a trifling expense.

A GENUINE WALTHAM WATCH

is made with special reference to durability. Other watches will run for a year or two, and then require, and require constant repairs; but a Waltham Watch will run faithfully for many years.

We sell these Watches—

In Solid-Silver Hunting Cases, $18.
In Solid-Gold Hunting Cases, $70.

We have prepared an Illustrated Price-List, which describes the various grades of Watches in detail, gives the weight and quality of the cases, and all other information necessary for an intelligent selection. We wish every one would send for it before ordering a Watch.

WRITE FOR IT AS FOLLOWS:

Messrs. Howard & Co.,
No. 785 Broadway, New York:

Please send me your illustrated Price-List of Waltham Watches, as per advertisement in Harper's Weekly.

(Sign name and address in full.)

The terms on which we sell these Watches are very liberal. We will send them by Express to any one, in any State or Territory, with the bill to be collected on delivery. On every bill we send there are printed instructions to the Express agent to allow the purchaser to open the package and examine the Watch before paying. If not satisfactory, you need not take it; and even when you have taken it, if it should not prove satisfactory, we will exchange it without expense, or Refund the Money.

We have sent out over Five Thousand of these Watches upon these conditions, and have only been asked to refund the money in three cases, and not a Watch has been returned on account of dissatisfaction with the Watch, but because the parties needed the money more.

We have no Agents, and our prices are the same to all. A resident of Oregon or Texas can buy a Watch from us and it will cost him no more than if he lived in New York. All this is explained in the Price-List.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We do not sell Waltham Watches in any Imitation, Gilt, Plated, Oroide, or Filled Cases whatever these are all either worthless or Second-class Silver). The Waltham Watch is worthy of a solid gold or silver case, and we do not propose to sell it in any other.

"THE PROMISED LAND," AS SEEN FROM THE DOME OF SAINT PETER'S, ROME.—[SEE PAGE 626.]

TWO DAYS.

AH, sly, with the birds and the bees,
My love rose yesterday;
And she sang with the thrush in the maple-trees,
And she rivaled their songs alway.
And robin mattered, and bobolink sputtered,
And said that her notes were false;
But she sang them again, such a gushing strain
That the lavender began to waltz.

The glint of the morning sun
Lay bright on my love's brown hair;
And the flowers in the garden, my darling,
Seemed suddenly grown less fair;
For her eyes (one dimple, half wild, half tender,
Eclipsed them, roses and all.
Oh, fair was that day! I cried, as she stood
By the rose-tree under the wall.

All still, like a nested bird,
My fair love lies to-night;
And the mellow notes that the robin heard
Are locked in her lips' now white.
In the early gloaming they'll wait her coming,
And list for her song in vain;
And the thrush's throat will swell with a note
That is echoed back again.

The setting sun's red ray
Falls bright on the locks of brown;
And the flowers in the garden seem to-day
To be drooping down and down;
Like pale dead lover they hang in their places,
Lilies, and roses, and all;
And all over my head the leaves lie around,
From the rose-tree under the wall.

THE PROMISED LAND.

MR. NAST and the New York Herald seem to have hit upon the same idea with regard to the future residence of the Pope. In its issue of September 16 that paper says: "We could offer to the Holy Father in New York. It has always been our conviction that the New World is his proper sphere. If the Old World is sick of him, as it seems to be, why should he not come to the New World, which allows its heart to go out to him with filial affection? . . . We may be permitted to express a little doubt as to the extent of the filial affection so lavishingly alluded to by the Herald; but the similarity between the newspaper paragraph and Mr. Nast's spirited sketch on our first page this week is curious.

THE CANDIDATES IN NEW YORK.

NOTHING more plainly shows the inability of the Democratic organs to find serious fault with the administration of General Grant than their incessant carping at his traveling, and living by the sea in summer, and their constant criticism of unimportant details of personal conduct. Those papers pay a similar tribute to the Republican candidate for Governor of New York. He has been Lieutenant-Governor, and he has served in the army. But, unable to find any thing discreditable in his public career, the journals of which we speak resort to personal ridicule. It is the old habit of the party. It has always relied upon the appeal to prejudice and passion, because it did not dare to confront the actual questions of the hour. For a generation the Democratic party, maintained its ascendency by feeling the hatred of the negro. Its conclusive argument against prohibitory slavery in the Territories was the query, "Do you want your daughter to marry a nigger?" And the spirit and scope and character of that argument it carries into every political discussion.

Are the principles of the Republican party any less sound, or its policy any less expedient, because General Woodford is a gentleman? Is a cause less respectable because its advocate is courteous? Under a free system of popular government, which is maintained and administered by a direct and constant appeal to public opinion, is any disadvantage to be considered that he is an admirable orator? To the Democratic judgment courtesy and eloquence may be ridiculous in a Republican candidate; but it seems that good-breeding and facility of speech are no objections in a Democratic Governor, or Mr. HOFFMAN would not now fill that office. Thus far the campaign of the Democrats in the State of New York has been nothing but a volley of personal abuse of the Republican candidate. But we are very sure that sensible Democrats will suspect that if nothing is said against a candidate but that he is polite and can make a fine speech, it is because no serious charge can be brought against him, and that he must be a very safe man to put at the head of the State.

If, indeed, it could be truly said of General WOODFORD that, notwithstanding attractive personal qualities, he had once been in a position of the highest public trust, in which he had betrayed the most sacred private rights, then, indeed, there would be a charge which must be satisfactorily explained, or he would be opposed by all honorable men. And that is precisely the position of Governor HOFFMAN. The representative of the rights of all the people, and, vested with the veto power for their protection, he has not hesitated to deprive honest men and women of the control of their own earnings invested in the Erie Railway, a control guaranteed to them by the terms of the charter. It is one of the worst political crimes ever committed. If the department of the man who condescended to such an outrage were as fine as Lord CHESTERFIELD hoped to make his son's, it could not save him from the censure and the contempt of all honest citizens. Yet the journals that support Mr. HOFFMAN for Governor of New York maintain that General WOODFORD is a polite! They really seem to suppose that a few sneering epithets hurled at the Republican candidate will divert the indignant and condemning acts of the Democratic Governor, and the proved enormous corruption of his masters, the Tammany managers.

General WOODFORD is a gentleman of unimpeached and unimpeachable private and official character. Governor HOFFMAN is the signer of the Erie bill, the officer who made it a law, and, overriding the charter itself, made Mr. TWEED and his friends—the creatures of Governor HOFFMAN—directors for four years, and entirely beyond the control of the stockholders. The Democratic journals are not more usefully employed in explaining to the voters of New York this conduct of their candidate, rather than decrying the character of General WOODFORD. To vociferate that General WOODFORD is "little," while the not large Mr. HOFFMAN is a giant, is not respected before the State of depriving honest people of the control of their own property, is plainly, as certain Democratic statesmen would professionally say, "to throw up the sponge."

THE CHANCES OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

THE immediate pressure of a state of war in France has prevented any thing like the public clamor against the republic. In its formation it was as much a coup d'état as the imperial usurpation, but, unlike that, it was bloodless, and an evident necessity of the situation. Since it has been established it is the only organization of authority in the country, and the instinct of a civilized community has perceived that it must, for the present at least, be supported. It was the same instinct that led the French people in 1815 to urge the body in France to recognize the Pallikar Ministry while it lasted, and to offer his sword to the Republic. In considering the chances of its permanence, the fact which we suggested the other day must not be forgotten, that a great deal of what is called the listlessness of the French is due to the constant baffling and betrayal of the nation by those who obtain power. This, indeed, is the opinion of LAMARTINE, and BERANGER says, there is nobody for Free-President, it is because the nation has not yet been allowed a fair chance of political education and development.

Of course the first obvious condition of the political situation in France is that the three of the old parties is much exhausted. The Legitimists, who had BERRYER and MONTALEMBERT in 1848, have no conspicuous leader. The Bonapartists, who were united by a splendid sentiment of romantic pride in 1848, have no other cohesion than that of possible public plunder. The Orleanists, who had failed by the blowing of interested classes in 1848, have become disorganized and dispersed. They have, indeed, a certain quasi-representative in the best Frenchmen, and the representatives of the family are honorable and able princes. But the glamour of the name is gone from France and it would not be easy to show that a perpetual President would not satisfy all the requirements of a monarchy, while a King would be an object of endless suspicion. A repetition of the folly of electing a member of the house of the French royal family President is not likely if the republic continues; and, from the party point of view solely, it seems not impossible that a republic may be established, considered, upon the whole, if not in itself desirable, yet the best guarantee of domestic order.

The only consideration is the hostility of foreign powers. None of them, of course, are friendly to a republic, but if ever a republic of France would be tolerated it would probably be now, when the doctrine of the right of every nation to settle its own questions for itself is even generally acknowledged—when the republic arises upon the ruins not of a royal house, but of the usurpation of a military adventurer—when the great national prestige of France has been broken and its military power virtually destroyed—when Germany, moreover, is magnanimous in the settlement of the war, a French republic will not be more disagreeable to our sensibility than the French empire has been. Indeed, it is not impossible that a certain feeling of gratitude may hereafter arise in the French heart should republican liberty and German magnanimity be ratified as simultaneous with the fall of NAPOLEON.

Meanwhile the troubles of the new republic, beginning under circumstances so trying, will serve to point the moral of the German disputes for royalty, while the revelations of NAPOLEON'S intrigues against the peace of Europe will quicken the perception that the republic is not likely to be a conspirator. We doubt, therefore, if republican France will be considered to be a worse European neighbor than imperial France has been.

The third consideration of the chances of a permanent republic is of another kind. It is the character, the habits, the political intelligence of the people. It will not be forgotten that some of the most accomplished and eminent liberals in France voted for the empire at the last election. They did so in the choice of an alternative. They felt that the question was imperial order, or anarchy and its chances, and voted for order. Our readers will remember that, just after the French election of last May, we spoke of a letter of LABOULAYE, by a friend of New York, explaining his position and his vote for the empire. LABOULAYE declared—and he is a man familiar with French politics, and entirely versed in political history and philosophy—that the French Republicans, as a body, had no conception either of the philosophy or the conditions of a republic. Their theory, he said, was government by a single chamber. They had no conception of the rights of minority, nor any respect for them; and when he told them that the object of a free constitution is to secure the liberty of the people, and to impose upon the legislature limits which it can not pass, he said that they looked at him in amazement, and could not comprehend him.

It will be confessed by every student of French politics that the Republicans in that country have not been very unable to perceive that the despotism of a majority is as hateful and unjust as that of a single man. French republic has not yet got to mean Parisian mob. If this conviction of LABOULAYE'S is sound, it is evident that the chief difficulty of the republic will be found among the Republicans. But this is the very hour when men like LABOULAYE and GASPARIN should bring their intelligence and courage to bear upon public opinion, and so upon the government of their country. The great principles of a republican system are the same where the same. The object of a constitution is to defend the people against their own ignorance and passion and folly. If they could, they would do the worship which demagogues offer, government would be unnecessary. Nothing shows the fitness of a man for self-government so distinctly as its will and capacity to restrain itself in its fundamental law. It is that which France will prove in the Constituent Assembly, and that alone can determine the question of the permanence of the French republic.

HONEST ELECTIONS.

THE Soldiers' Convention, which met at Saratoga the day before the Republican Convention, and of which General WOODFORD was president, passed some very stringent resolutions. They clearly comprised the honesty of elections as the chief issue in the pending political campaign in this State.

The Republican Convention also spoke itself in the strongest terms upon the same point. Indeed the conviction is universal not only that Mr. HOFFMAN owes his office to a dishonest vote and by a fraudcount, but that an honest election would reveal a very decided Republican majority in the State. The Democratic journals affect to sneer at the assertion that there is fraud at the polls in New York. They insist that it is only a Republican invention to create apparent interference. Indeed, what it is notorious that the greatest peril to our government is not foreign hostility but the enormous power of corruption so fatal at the polls, the Democratic party is steadily arrayed against every effort to guard the ballot-box. It opposes an educational test, and competent and realization laws as it sees fit, as the Congressional provision to secure an honest election.

For the true ground which a law has been attacked, whose sole and obvious purpose is the protection of every honest voter, it might be supposed that a republic may be destroyed by the liberties of the people. But the cry of hostility proceeded from the tools of the Ring in order to destroy the popular and important liberties. If any body in the country doubts that there is the most enormous and unbiushing dishonesty at the polls in New York, he has only to recall the testimony of the New York World, a Democratic paper in this city. About the elections, on the 5th of September, 1869, that paper said:

"The editor of the World saw by what shameless and open corruption the last gubernatorial of the Ring on WILLIAM M. TWEED and ABNER HALL cut down between them the rightful vote at the election of HORATIO SEYMOUR."

MR. TWEED, as our distant readers may not know, is the Boss of Tammany Hall: and he, with MR. SWEENY and MR. OAKEY HALL, the Mayor of NEW YORK, compose the Democratic triumvirate who absolutely control the party in this State.

These gentlemen, it that appears, are accused by their own party associate of cheating at elections. It is not a general Republican charge; it is a distinct personal declaration of a Democratic editor that he himself knew the fraud.

To reject the testimony is to discredit every assertion made by the paper. Republican investigation has indeed already established the fact, but it is confirmed by this Democratic confession. The World pushed the war. It resolved, as it valiantly said, and to the great amusement of all who knew how powerless it had been proved to be in its party, to break the Ring and relieve the party of the odium of dishonest management and of fraudulent elections. The contest was joined in the Legislature with MR. TWEED, whom the paper had denounced as a shameless corruptionist. MR. TWEED'S victory was as thorough and final as that of the Germans at Sedan. The Dictator of Tammany put the World in his pocket, and there it has remained quietly ever since. Except, indeed, when Congress passed a law to protect honest voters against such shameless frauds as the World declared MR. TWEED practiced in NEW YORK.

Upon that occasion the World put its head out of the pocket of the gentleman whom it had described as a shameless corruptionist, and exclaimed, on the 21st of May, 1870:

"What does this howl about the necessity of Congress reconstructing the ballot-boxes of this city mean? Is it seriously asserted that these fellows [the Congress of the United States] do not mean to lose their hold on the throats of the people, and, when the time arrives to them their coming explosion, intend to reconstruct her d—d South Carolina, in order to remain in power? . . . The ballot and strong trooly toll must have a care how they talk of putting the bayonet to New York. It may be, and we hope it is, but the more crazy wrong of disfranchising the sainte; but if a deeper purpose is entertained it would be pleasant to put the issue to the test. The people of the United States have endured too much from Radicalism to now submit to be cheated of their votes through the administration of this country from the hands that dishonor it into a better and purer, if less pretentious, possession.

The World having thus emerged to eat humble pie in public, and to assert in high terms the honesty of elections and pure which it had described in September as shamelessly corrupt, those hands closed over it again.

The true way of elections is to be vindicated in this State against managers whom their own associates denounce as shamelessly corrupt; and the same managers who, having contemptuously covered the World with inextinguishable ridicule, have aroused the deep indignation and disgust of all thoughtful men of every party by compelling their Governor to sign the Erie bill, of which we speak elsewhere. If the people of New York, whatever their party sympathies, wish to protect from pollution the very springs of free popular government, they will greatly consider whether they are likely to do it by intrusting that government to men whom their own partisans denounce as shameless corruptionists, and whose supremacy in their party is proved by the fact that they compel their opponents in the ranks to praise them as the most glorious heroes, and control the most important acts of the nominal head of the State government.

THE PEOPLE.

IT was reported a few days since from Paris that the people had attacked the office of the Marseillaise, the paper which HENRI ROCHEFORT had formerly edited, and had done a great deal of mischief. But it was not the people who attacked the office—it was a mob; and we shall greatly show the difference which exists in many minds in regard to popular action. The first proclamation of the new Government in Paris, signed by LEON GAMBETTA as Minister of the Interior, states that the new order has been "ratified by popular acclamation." It was the same kind of popular sanction by the Democratic mob in New York in 1863. The riots of that time were called a demonstration of the people. But such a mob of the people is the gravest insult in a republic. To yield to its menace and call it submission to the people is to overthrow the first foundations of civil order. We have elsewhere considered the chances of the republic in France. Here it is only evident that it is rapidly the choice of the French people. It was proclaimed in many of the chief cities, as it was in Paris, as the "popular acclamation" of a multitude, which it was not wise to resist, even had there been any wish of resistance.

Hence, the folly of urging an immediate recognition of the republic by our own Government or by other powers. The President very wisely indicated that MR. WASHBURNE is to acknowledge the Government de facto. That was of course. Our own interests require that those who represent our people and order shall be acknowledged. It was for that reason that we recognized LOUIS NAPOLEON. But it was not our policy to delay recognition by acknowledging a government which we did not know and could not know was founded in the popular consent, because of the French journals (perhaps even M. JULES FAVRE, expected some kind of active intervention in favor of the republic. But if MR. WASHBURNE had asked for the evidence that a republic existed, he could have been shown nothing but a vote of a minority of the Chambers and the acquiescence of the cities, an acquiescence which we might very justly infer was based upon the necessities of the situation, and which regarded the new Government merely as a Committee of NATIONAL Defense.

Of course we are not asserting that the republic will not be sustained, but only that the people of France have not yet established it, and that therefore it was thoughtless in any responsible Frenchman or American to suppose that we could do more than we have done. As we have stated in another place, the chances of the permanence of a republic in France seem more promising than ever before. But the Constituent Assembly may decide otherwise. It may not ratify the authority which empowers it, and may consider that a constitutional monarchy is a better security of order than a republic. The present government is that of a few men who declare the old system overthrown, and who control affairs until some new system is adopted. And the perplexity of the situation as we write is, that no settlement with the present authorities could be considered final. It must be ratified in the nation, to which they also look to justify their own existence.

THE MORAL IN MISSOURI.

THE action of the Republicans in Missouri, like the vote in the House of Representatives upon the President's proposition to remove disqualifying disabilities; demand a reduction of taxation as rapid as is honorably practicable; oppose any system of taxation which is unjust to industry or interest at the expense of others; and protest against any sectarian abuse of the school fund. Upon these general points all conventions agreed. Beside these, the Brown party very wisely and firmly demand a thorough reform of the civil service upon a basis which we do not believe would be distasteful to the other. The question, therefore, becomes very interesting, why there was any division?

The difference is in the known views of the candidates. Governor McCLURE, who, according to the Tribune, is an open and ardent protectionist, accepts the nomination of a convention which declares itself opposed "to any system of taxation which will tend to create monopolies, and benefit one industry or interest at the expense of another." The reverse reference apparently refused to support a man whom they knew to be opposed to their principles. This shows that they hold those principles to be more precious than the cohesion of the party upon the other issues. They will take the risk of party defeat rather than secure success with a candidate who is unsound upon revenue reform.

Now it seems to us the duty of wise politicians to insist upon the first, not the second. It is not enough to decide one party to the difference as disorganizers. That party believes utterly sure that it regards the revenue question as of vital importance. It may be mistaken, but it is merely childish to deny its honesty. Now what is true in Missouri is true in the House of Representatives, and is, of course, true elsewhere in the country. It is therefore essential that the Republican party, where should give the subject the most serious attention, in order that the Republican revenue policy may be plain and unanswerable at the next session of Congress. Let us have no repetition of the sorry spectacle of a Republican President making an important suggestion to a Republican Congress, upon which the Republican majority divides, and defeats the executive. Such a spectacle is deplorable, because apparently sanctioning the President ought to be adopted by Congress, but because the difference of the President and his supporters in Congress upon certain fundamental questions tends to show that the party has no common principle upon such questions; and a party wanting such community of doctrine upon such essential points can not hope to retain general sympathy and support.

Let us take to heart the moral which the position of the party in Missouri suggests, and not think that we have done our duty when we have angrily asserted that the revenue reformers are traitors, plotting for the success of the common enemy.

THE SIMMONS COLLEGE.

WHATEVER differences of opinion there may be of what are called Women's Rights, there is one right of women which the most crabbed conservatism will not deny, and that is the right to make an honest living if they can. It has certainly never been satisfactorily demonstrated why thousands of widows with families dependent upon them, and thousands of unmarried women, should be straitened and starving because it is the natural expectation of women to be married and supported by their husbands. It may also be very unwomanly for any woman to feel that, as a member of society, having the same kind and degree of interess in the common welfare with every one else, she ought to have a voice in its general direction; but why it should be unwomanly to wish to be useful in the world, and to support herself honorably, is not easy to see. Evidently the late Mr. JOHN SIMMONS, of Boston, could not see it. A quiet, industrious, thrifty, thoughtful man, he saw that what thousands of women want is a chance of helping themselves. Give them that, and the melancholy and suffering and despair of innumerable aimless lives will disappear. And so Mr. SIMMONS provided in his will that they should have that chance.

He has left one million and four hundred thousand dollars to establish the Simmons Female College, in which women may study medicine, music, drawing, designing, telegraphy, and other branches of art to enable them to earn an honorable livelihood. Young women who think that the acquisition of useful knowledge is unwomanly will smile at the Simmons College. Young gentlemen who think it unlikely that a lady to support herself will sigh at so vulgar a perversion of money. And the worthy persons who are exceedingly troubled lest women should "desert their sphere," and "descend from their pedestal," will groan at this radically "unsexing" proposition as another fatal disturbance of the natural order of the universe.

But while all these excellent people groan, we trust that many women, who are neither over delicately nurtured, however daintily accomplished, however gracefully idle they may be, will rejoice that the Simmons College is successful, and the most devoted die, that they themselves are subject to every chance of life, and that the happiness of those more dear to them themselves may depend upon their ability to be self-dependent of others. "I should be rich if I hadn't a cent in the world," said a distinguished man, "for I am a practical baker." But he has not worn the baker's apron for thirty years. Many women have in the same way made the practical skill of any kind for their support, but they are none the poorer in womanliness nor in the graces and elegancies of life. Surely, in Long Life and countless students the Simmons College for Women!

"THE BURNING OF DARIEN, GEORGIA."

WE publish with great pleasure the following letter, and remind our readers that subscriptions may be sent, prior to the senior warden, to the Rev. ROBERT F. CRUSE, rector, or to the Rt. Rev. JOHN W. BECKWITH, Bishop of Georgia:

"To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

"SIR,—Through several copies sent to me my attention was called to the article in HARPER'S WEEKLY of September 3, 1870, with the above caption. You published a letter of Colonel ROBERT F. CRUSE, dated from Darien shortly after the event, to prove that he was not responsible for the burning of Darien. I do not wish to make out a clear case of the Colonel's blamelessness, but I think of his abhorrence of the deed, as shown even by these extracts, to be fixed upon General HUNTER and Colonel SHERMAN.

"In this as it may, as one of the authors of the appeal for relief for St. Andrew's Church, addressed 'to the members of the Episcopal Church and to the friends of religion and education in the United States,' which appeared from the above-named publication office, I state in your columns that the object of the circular was misunderstood. The appeal was made in good conscience, the said historical fact of the destruction of the church, building, church and academy, and the appurtenant grounds upon which assistance was asked. It was not intended to involve the Federal Government in any way, or any one, as you will readily observe by reference to the printed copy. Yet I now state that no effort of such a construction had been placed upon the circular, to the injury of the Church, by intention or by silence.

"The impression prevailed in this community that Colonel SHERMAN commanded the troops by which Darien was plundered and destroyed. Before leaving the city of Savannah I called at the few citizens who remained in the vicinity at the time—a few days after the conflagration—to the end that they might give me any information on this point. In answer to my inquiries I was told that the order had been taken from an old mill, left standing, upon his return into Darien a few hours after the fire, by a colonel's staff. That card is before me. I extract from it the following: 'Col. W. T. SHERMAN, 13th Regt. Wisconsin Volunteers, 1st Brigade, 1st Division, 15th Army Corps, Major-General FRANK P. BLAIR, commanding.' The signature to the card, which contained only old men, women, and children, who were then gathered in the open wood around the smouldering ruins of their homes, I shall shortly show from the fire.' His opinion or the transaction is expressed in his own language, as published by you: 'I think now, as I did at the time of the burning of Darien, that such destruction is cruel, barbarous, impolitic, and degrading to ourselves and our men, and I shall always regret that I expressed myself as I did.' Will not Northern friends, taking the simple appeal of the members of the parish in connection with the expression of Colonel SHERMAN, the rebuilding of St. Andrew's Church a fit subject for their generosity and love upon the footing of "'Respectfully yours,

"'ROBERT F. CRUSE, Late Colonel, 13th Regt. Wisconsin Volunteers.'

NOTES.

THE conservation of power was never more strikingly illustrated than in a late act of HENRY ROCHEFORT'S. His paper, the Marseillaise, has waged the most relentless warfare upon the empire; and after the murder of his friend and associate by PIERRE BONAPARTE, last spring, it seemed as if ROCHEFORT might become the chief figure of a revolution. Elected to the Chambers, his paper was still unsparing, and he was finally arrested and condemned. When the war began he was imprisoned in Paris. When the reverses occurred he was removed to Vincennes. When the republic was declared he was brought back to Paris, and made one of the Provisional Government. A day or two afterward the Marseillaise published an article denouncing the new Government. On the following morning ROCHEFORT announced that he no longer had any connection whatever with the paper, and severely reproved the tone of the article, declaring it to be the duty of all good citizens to sustain the Government. Thereupon the mob attacked the office of the paper, and destroyed the offensive issue. MR. ROCHEFORT had the opportunity of knowing how LOUIS NAPOLEON fell when the Spectator would not back the empire.

IT must be rather disagreeable to the better kind of Democratic journals to urge the defeat of the Republicans in this State upon the ground that they have unreasonable and honorable motives for preventing the unspeakable suffering and ignominy which must result from drunkenness. The speaking way in which this argument is illustrated by some Democratic papers is characteristic. But the great body of intelligent German voters, as they are called, although they are American citizens, are as much opposed to grog-selling as any respectable class of the community. The position of the Republican party in the State upon the subject is precisely defined at the late Convention. It accepts, as the Democrats accept, the license system, as a wise and orderly restraint; but it will not trust it nor any party that while the people of the towns and villages are left to the mercy of the rum-shop Democracy excise law to license the sale of intoxicating liquors, they should have the right, by a majority of votes, to prohibit such sales. The Republican party can better afford to lose than to keep the support of those who do not see how closely the common welfare, private happiness, and public taxation are connected with a wise supervision of the sale of intoxicating liquors.

THE Young Democracy, as they cheerfully call themselves, are organizing for the election. They will not, of course, expect public confidence in advance, but they will rely on the Legislature last spring. The difference, as they say in the West, between the "advertised bulls" and the performance is so ineffably ludicrous that the audience will now naturally wait for the rest. For the Democratic managers the amusement may be very serious. Their unmitigated despotism is such that, sooner or later, a successful revolution against it is inevitable, and this may be the beginning. If the Young Democracy should be elected, the effect may be to give us another, of course. They are Democrats like their opponents in their camp. Nobody can tell what they mean: and therefore it is hardly worth while for them to say a great deal about their views and other virtues. The Young Democracy simply do not see why Tammany should have all the loot. From their point of view, Tammany has had the spoils, and there is no reason whatever why they should not have their share. Rather than the whole. Meanwhile the public knows that it is sure to suffer, whichever party wins.

IT would be very amusing if the first event after the declaration of papal infallibility should be the re-appearance of the Pope in the city of Rome. The Italian Government is about to take possession of what is called its natural capital. It professes great respect for his Holiness, and proposes to treat him with the utmost reverence. But the Pope and his Minister, ANTONELLI, know very well that when VICTOR EMANUEL is once in Rome he will no longer keep THACKERAY tells us of the fine dinners where the gorgeously liveried attendants are bullied by the rude dependent of the host who keeps watch of the loss. So the Pope would curiously look upon the glorious possession of honor of the Italian army as his jailers in uniform. But it is not the least of the changes which the war invoked that the Papacy is likely to produce in the Pope, that the temporal sovereignty of Rome, which has been the helpless victims of ecclesiastics, who are the worst of tyrants. By the occupation of Rome by the Italian Government the long-expressed Papal Status will be opened to the humane and enlightened influences which they have been so long and so disastrously denied.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE SITUATION IN FRANCE.

THE gates of Paris were closed on the 16th of September, but the city continued to be in a state of agitation. Its power to resist an attack, in the opinion of military men, is limited to about 200,000 men. Until then it is ample. General TROCHU has 400,000 men under arms, and has made most complete preparations for defense. If the enemy should batter down the walls, or get within the city by any other means, he will have to fight his way over formidable barricades. There is an immense supply of powder within the city, and plenty of arms. The people are resolved to die, but resistance will be extended to enable Strasburg

It was supposed that the forces now the actual seat of government in France on September 18 that on the preceding day Prussia would make a movement from Paris, and discovered a force of 20,000 Prussian cavalry and infantry. A skirmish ensued, in which the French lost fifteen killed and thirty wounded. A cannonade followed, lasting two hours. Concealing his force the enemy fell in the direction of Versailles and Meudon. The first of these forts is on the south and the other on the southeast of Paris, and they are the external line of defense. On the 19th the fort at Vincennes was destroyed by the French, the position being considered untenable. At latest advices the Prussians were moving directly around the city, and cutting it off from communication with the rest of France. Strasburg, by capitulation had not surrendered up to the 20th evening, it was reported, to the fact that the heavy Prussian guns could not reach the fort in the south in the direction of La Nance as Illzin, from which the water had been suddenly drained by the French forces.

It was reported from London on the 19th ult. that Lord LYONS was conducting negotiations between M. JULES FAVRE and Count VON BISMARCK, and that a short armistice had been agreed to. It was reported that the Prussian Government had previously rejected the proposition of the Count de M. THIARD, the Envoy to Prussia of the new empire, designated city and its territories, with the exception of Metz and Strasburg, from a Napoleonic dynasty, and the Regency be instituted.

The heroic defense of the city of Strasburg excites the admiration of Europe. A dispatch dated from the New York World, dated Carlsruhe, September 18, says: "An English eye-witness describes that the 14th of August who witnessed the bombardment of Strasburg on the 13th, says that, unless the views of the besiegers are pushed with more intelligence and activity than has been manifested hitherto, they will have no reason why the city should not hold out for a long time to come. He says that the fortifications and the defenses are excellent, that the bombardments of the besieged are heavier and better served than those of the besiegers, that the garrison and citizens are animated by the Baden troops, and that a mutiny took place in the Prussian camp on the 12th instant, in which several of the artillerymen occupying, and defending themselves in, the reformed gun at that point, which the besieged had previously destroyed before the disturbance were suppressed."

The Commercial Gazette of September 19 has a lengthy article giving the following interesting statistics and facts concerning the siege of Strasburg: "There are now before Strasburg eighteen batteries of mortars, each battery containing from six to twelve mortars, 108 mortars in all, and they every day. Thirty-two loads of munitions of war are brought into the city every day, and the bombardment continues by night.

The fortress of Toul still holds out bravely against the Prussians.

A dispatch from King William makes a great reduction in the number of prisoners reported in the capitulation of Sedan. It states that the total number of prisoners actually captured was only 83,000, including 39 generals and 2500 officers, two of whom were released on parole to bear the capitulation to Wilhelmshöhe. It is reported that great numbers of soldiers escaped into Belgium, and that actual captures, and those on parole, were 40,000.

The mission of the French fleet has utterly failed. Intelligence from Constantinople states that the proposal made to him by the Minister of Marine, who arrived at Cherbourg, has now been known. He was warned that several armor-clad ships would follow him at brief intervals, and that the Turkish Government will not, at thirty or forty thousand troops, for land service, which would be of no use to him. Nothing of the kind been done, and his position has been a difficult and painful one. He has refused to deliver the dispatches from commanding the entrance are situated so high that they can only be reached by ladders. The guns are said to be of 100 pounders, and has been made unsuccessful by the Turkish Government. Admiral LOUIS has been ordered from the Baltic and North seas, are to protect Cherbourg, Havre, and other ports.

AFFAIRS IN ITALY.

An official dispatch to the Italian Government at Florence from the head-quarters of the Italian army at Occupation in the Roman territory, dated at Monte Rotondo, September 19, says that Count DE SONNAZ came to General CADORNA's quarters by authorization of Cardinal ANTONELLI, and that the Cardinal had agreed that the troops should enter the city of Rome, and his Holiness was unable, on account of the state of his health, to leave the city. The Pope, according to these advices, by General Cadorna intended to take possession of the Quirinal Palace, and to issue his proclamation. The King had shown great patience, and the people had attempted to deliver the Pope from the city and rule the Pope, tried that patience severely. The Italian army, which formed the siege of Rome for four hours, that he might bring additional influence to bear upon the Pope, and that he might be yielded at to suspend the attack on Rome for twenty-four hours, and that he might be allowed to enter the city without resistance.

The following dispatches give the latest intelligence from Rome and the Pope:

Florence, September 18.—The latest advices from Rome state that the Pope and his Government have taken refuge in the Castle of St. Angelo, and that the Italian troops are in the city. [Evening Post.

Florence, September 18.—The people of Rome are in favor of the annexation of Rome to Italy. The Romans and the clergy refrain from taking practical steps in that direction.

WILHELMSHÖHE.

WILHELMSHÖHE (in English signifying William's Height), which has been designated by KING WILLIAM as the residence of NAPOLEON, and of which we give two illustrations on this page, is one of the most delightful resorts of royalty in Germany—more so on account of its fine location and beautiful park than its palace. But the most remarkable feature of the place is the grand cascade, fountains, and other water-works, which deservedly rank among the finest of Europe. The mountain-side upon which they are located, situated about three miles from the city of Cassel, is upward of twelve hundred feet in height, and is crowned with a huge structure, in the shape of an octagon, called the Giant's Castle, from the centre of which rises a pyramid, ninety-six feet in height, supporting a bronze statue of Hercules full thirty feet high. The castle covers the reservoir containing the waters which, on Sundays and fête days, are let loose, and flow down an inclined plane of three hundred yards, with a width of forty feet, broken at distances of fifty yards by small basins. The whole is constructed of solid masonry. At the foot the water is gathered again to pass through an aqueduct that looks like a relic of ancient Rome, and finally shoots up, in a stream of twelve inches thickness, to the height of one hundred and ninety feet. This fountain is visible beyond the chateau in our first illustration.

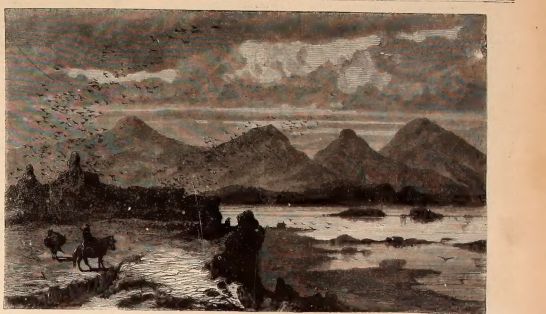
A JOURNEY THROUGH ICELAND.

CHAPTER III.

The Population of Iceland.—Severity of the Climate.—Former Mildness.—Magnificent Lake Scenery.—Swimming a River.—Crossing at a Ford.—A Lake of Boiling Springs.

THE population of Iceland was in former times considerably greater than it is now, although, after a long period of gradual diminution, it is now again tending to an increase. The tendency to diminution, which for a long time was quite manifest, was due apparently to two causes: first, a relaxation of the spirit of persecution at home, and a diminution of the civil and political troubles, in consequence of which a smaller number of families were driven to flight or exile, thus diminishing the immigration; and, secondly, a gradual change in the climate of the island, resulting in an increase of cold, and a consequent curtailment of the productiveness of vegetation. For, though the islanders depend in a great measure for their subsistence on the products of the sea, the grass which sustains their domestic animals is of vast importance to them. The growth and the value of this grass are much greater than one would suppose possible in a country lying on the confines of the arctic circle. For, in all these regions, through the effects of the warm currents of water carried thither by the Gulf Stream, and of other cosmical influences, the summers, such as they are, are protracted, and the winters are far less severe than the latitude would indicate. Thus, in respect to Iceland, the July isothermal of Newfoundland, which lies a thousand miles to the southward, passes through it. In winter the advantage is greater still, for the January isothermal of Iceland passes through New York. In other words, in Iceland they have the summers of Labrador, with the winters of New York: that is to say, the influences above referred to carry to this region in summer the climate of countries situated a thousand, and in winter of those fifteen hundred, miles to the southward of them.



LAKE SCENERY IN ICELAND.

Whether any part of this relaxation in Iceland of the severity of the cold natural to the latitude is due to the volcanic heat still slumbering beneath the surface of the ground is, perhaps, uncertain. It is known that the rocks forming the crust of the earth are very slow conductors of heat. There is found to be, moreover, a gradual but very regular increase of temperature as we descend from the surface in all parts of the earth, and this being the case, there must be a real, though perhaps small and inappreciable, warming of the surface every where from the heat within. This effect must be still more decided in volcanic countries, where the heated portions come much nearer the surface, and the effect must be felt more sensibly in the colder latitudes, on account of the greater contrast between the outer and the inner portions. If this is so, and if the volcanic heat of Iceland is, as would appear to be the case, gradually declining—it certainly is infinitely less than it was at some former period, since the whole mass is volcanic, and was once in a state of fusion—the gradual deterioration of the climate and the diminution of vegetation are at least partially explained.

That there has been this gradual refrigeration of the climate, or at least of the soil, of Iceland, within a moderate number of centuries past, is shown not only by the historical testimony in respect to the state of things in former times, but also by traces, in many places apparent, of a former luxuriance of vegetation which now no longer exists. Varieties of grain were once produced which now can not be made to ripen, and were but little raised from the sea, and if sufficient time had elapsed since the ejection of the basalt and lava for the surface to have covered itself with a soil. But this is not the case. The interior rises here and there into long mountainous ranges and lofty summits, some of which are covered with eternal ice and snow; and when the elevation is not sufficient to reach the line of perpetual congelation the rocks are rugged and bare, and, as is usual with volcanic products, have, in cooling and in suffering disintegration from the weather, opened vertical instead of horizontal seams, and present to view a confused mass of peaks and pinnacles and precipices and chasms, forming a lasting surface which it will require, as it would seem, some millions of years more of winter frost and summer rain to soften and subdue, and cover with a surface of fertile soil.

And yet, savage and inhospitable as is the expression of the scenery of the interior in general, the traveler sometimes comes suddenly upon an attractive view. There are many lakes in the country, and some of these, with their surroundings, would form charming landscapes if they were bordered with forests and fields, and their banks were adorned with human habitations.

These lakes are formed, of course, of the accumulations from thermiæ, which come from the condensation of the vapors that ascend from the comparatively warm seas which environ the island. When there is a channel of communication open between one of these lakes and the sea it is ever so formed. Some of these rivers are a hundred and fifty miles or more in length, and they flow through the wildest country and over the roughest beds, with cascades and cataracts innumerable, for, on account of the great elevation of the interior portions of the island, the descent is usually very great from their sources to the sea. Of course these rivers add greatly to the difficulty of travelling, but many of them, especially as they approach toward the sea, are broad and deep. At some of the crossing-places one need not wish boat is found, by means of which the party of travelers and their guides can pass, while the horses are made to swim. Where this mode of transportation is not provided the only alternative is to follow up the bank of the river till a place is found shallow enough to be forded. Some of these fords would seem, from the representations made to us by travelers, to be dangerous in the extreme.

Whatever lakes have been formed in hollows which have no channel of communication with the sea, so that no river can flow from them to carry off the surplus water, a means of escape through which once often subpluerous and subflowating vapors, always disagreeable, and sometimes dangerous. Over some of these bogs, in certain parts of the country, the horse-path is carried by a kind of narrow embankment of logs, which quakes under the tread, and threatens to engulf the traveler in the most horrible slough that the imagination can conceive.

As the traveler advances into the interior, indications of the increase of the subterranean heat, or rather of its influence approaching nearer to the surface of the ground, multiply. Hot sees columns of vapor rising from the ground in various places, usually in the vicinity of surface water, either that of a river or a lake. One striking example of this is seen at a lake called Lake Langunya, a Dutch name signifying Bathing Lake, which designation seems to intimate that in former times, when the country was more populous, it may have been resorted to by the inhabitants for the purpose of bathing in its pure waters; for the name could have been given to it by a kind of figure of speech, playfully, as a large hollow pool in sometimes called the Punch-Bowl, or a frightful chasm, of rocks the Lover's Leap. At any rate, on the borders of this lake for several leet apparently throw up columns of vapor that rise sometimes quite high into the air, and attract the attention of the traveler long before he arrives at the lake.

All these issings of hot water and steam from the interior are also, no doubt, to the possession of the subterranean fire through orifices and fissures in the rocks to the heated, and perhaps even fused, strata below. Sometimes these orifices penetrate to a moderate depth only they are brought into contact with strata the temperature of which is only moderately raised, and the vapor issue, wherever they can find an opening at a lower level, in a warm spring, or a hot spring, or a boiling spring—or even in a continuous jet of roaring vapor, like that of a gigantic boiler blowing off its steam. In all these cases we see only different forms of the great conflict which is still going on, and has been going on for ages, between the internal heat of these volcanic regions and the external cold; for the liquidity of the water, given to it by the atmospheric pressure prevailing without, is only the product and the expression of cold, and the vehicle, moreover, by which the cold is carried down to the field of conflict within.

CHAPTER XIX.

RICHARD BURNS HIS BOATS.

IT was strange enough that day after day and week after week passed by without Mr. Dymock thick making any reference to the application his guest had made for his daughter's hand. His silence certainly seemed to favor it; and the more so since, notwithstanding what he knew, he put no obstacle in the way of the young people's meeting and enjoying each other's society as heretofore. Perhaps he had too strong a confidence in Harry's sense of duty, or in the somewhat more than filial fear in which she stood of him. Perhaps Richard's quietly but undemonstrative behavior toward the girl in the presence of others deceived him. At all events, the summer came and still found Richard under the same roof with Harry, and more like one of the family than ever. Indeed, as the young man's own position in life, and even of the same profession, began to vie with that of the course "put up" at the Castle, but he found nothing so attractive in their company as to withdraw him from that homely comfort of his per parlor for a single evening. He was always made welcome there by both his host and hostess; and without doubt, so far as the former was concerned, a less sanguine man than the young landowner might have easily persuaded that his suit was tacitly accepted to.

Even Harry herself—to whom her father's conduct was surprising enough—had come at last to this conclusion. Only one thing militated against this pleasant view of affairs—it was certain that the old man had not yet opened his lips to "Sol" upon the matter. It was clear that the miner still considered himself in the light of Harry's accepted suitor. As a lover, he was fortunately phlegmatic, and still found himself those little tributes of affection in the shape of smiles and whispers, secret glances, silent pressures, which his position might have exacted; but he would now and then pay her a blundering compliment in a manner that could not be misinterpreted, or even make some direct allusion to their future settlement in life, which embarrassed her still more. The young girl, as we have hinted, was by no means incapable of dissimulation, but she naturally revolted against having to support such a rôle as this, and would have even run the risk of compromising what might have been a catastrophe by undeceiving him. But Richard hadn't her have patience. He had growing matters, and he was not going to risk being well satisfied with the present state of affairs. It was unfortunately a subject that he was ill writing to the contrary, it is the woman who suffers; it is she who is the small trader, who can least afford to be out of pocket. In the present case, Richard saw no immediate necessity for pressing the matter of marriage, upon which point he was clear, nevertheless, as deeply set as ever. He would not (to do him justice) have been parted from his Harry for all the world; but then, as he by-handed; and the more he humored the old man, and abstained from demanding his consent, the better for himself. Richard never preferred to procrastinate, the better favor he would have with him, and consequently the better chance of getting the dowry with his daughter. Even if he should press matters, it was probable, he reasoned, that Verchilek had not yet done with him. He had doubtless written to Mr. Whymper, and warned old Dymock against him. Richard owed to him—and no more; that is to say, that he was, though an unacknowledged offspring of the Empire, in a measure responsible for his conduct toward him than that of a mere natural son. Verchilek certainly was not to be trusted; but, less to his advantage—or he certainly would not have kept silence for so long.

Such was the state of affairs at Gethin. Harry with her two suitors; her father with his two expectant sons-in-law, and Richard had ample or less of reason for his expectation. Though Richard might be satisfied with it, it was clear he could not long remain so. Day by day, day on which the change took place, though it was in no wise remarkable in other respects, he grew forgetful of his appointments with it, though disregarded at the time, impressed itself upon his mind, and was afterward to be one of a thousand times. It might have been marked in the hitherto sunny calendar of his life as the "Tuesday after Harry's Levee." Her levee and Pleasure-ground.

It was the number, and there were more tourists at the inn than could be accommodated, so Richard had given up his private sitting-room to their temporary use. This, however, did not throw him more in Harry's society than usual, for tourists' proceedings are generally early in the time. He had not, indeed, seen her since the mid-day meal which he had taken in the bar parlor; but that was only because he had been away, to call for him at a certain spot where he had gone to meet a party who were to find lunch. The attraction of the castled rock was such that few visitors sought the former spot, notwithstanding its picturesque and wild appearance, for the church maintained itself on that elevated and unsheltered hill, despite such winds as blow in the valley, with almost a miracle: but there it stood—as it had done for centuries—grey, solitary, unlike, and yet considerably larger than a small in comparison with its God's-acre, which was of vast extent, and only sparsely occupied by graves. The burn and rocky road was almost valueless; it is as easy for one duly qualified to concentrate a score ideas as one single of the materials of the low stone wall that marked its limits had been close at hand. In one or two cases only did the dead lie beneath the stones of wrecked mariners—the very names of whom were unknown—but the rest had been carefully interred; and where the victims of the Plague reposed by scores. Even Gethin had not escaped the ravages of that fell visitor, which was then very singular, had not been from it twice over; for, on the occasion of an ordinary burial having taken place many generations after the first calamity, in the same spot, the diocese had broken forth afresh, and scattered hundreds of the dead hamlet ancient death. The particulars of the catastrophe, as recorded on the tablet of an antique legend and hoary ruin, were engraven on a stone above the spot, which had never since been disturbed.

In a lone corner, as though seeking in its humility to be as much out of sight as possible, was a quaint old stone, but it seemed even older, because there were weeds at the foot of the tablet which were no longer known to man. Seated on the low wall beside it, Richard was transferring to his sketch-book the relic of the past in the midst, a tenantless manner—now gazing out upon the far-stretching sea, whose blue and bright waters were bowed by a passing cloud; now down into the village, which stood on a lower hill, with a ravine between. He had seen the post-cart come and go—for it came in and went out simultaneously at that out-of-the-way hamlet, where there was no one to write complainingly to the papers concerning the inefficiency of the mail service—and it was about letters that Harry to come and fetch him, as she had appointed. But presently his reason for his lingering became apparent in the person of her father. It was not unusual for Old Verchilek, at the close of the day, to call at the cottage in the ravine, which the guide to the ruin inhabited in the summer months, and see how business was doing in that quarter. If he had no eye for the picturesque, he had a very sharp one for the shillings which were made out of it; and Richard was not surprised to see the landlord descending the opposite hill. "This will keep Harry at home; confound him!" muttered the young man to himself, from temporary fear of separation. As there was now no one to watch for, he worked with more assiduity, and with much improvement to his subject that he was first made conscious that he was not alone by the sudden presence of a shadow on his sketch-book. He looked up, not a little startled, and there was John Trevethick standing beside him, his huge form half-hidden by a cloak.

"You may well be frightened, young gentleman," were his first remarks, "for I'm a deadly man," were his first remarks, "for I'm a deadly man," were his first remarks, "for I'm a deadly man and, having resolved upon his ruin, were they already making him mad? He was after the old man, who did not so much as turn to look behind him, though he could not but have heard his rapid steps. "Mr. Trevethick, I will do it," he gasped out.

"Do what?" said the other, contemptuously, striding on. "Go hang yourself, or jump off Gothin rock into the sea?"

"I will get you the money that you speak of—the two thousand pounds. You shall have it in your hand, and keep it for that matter, if you please."

"What?" Unutterable astonishment stared out from the landlord's face. For the first time since the receipt of Caress's letter he began to disbelieve its contents. If this young fellow had really the immediate command of so large a sum, there was probably much more "behind him." He must either have a fortune in his own right, or if Carew had settled such a sum of money on him, he must have had a reason for it, and that reason Richard had assigned. And if so, Wheal Danes might be his to dispose of even yet. But Trevethick was not the man to be deceived or bribed by foregone conclusions. "You have not got this money in your pocket, have you?" said he, with a short dry laugh.

"No, Sir; but I can get a check for it from my mother, in course of post."

"A check!" cried the other, contemptuously, all his suspicions returning with tenfold force. "I would not give one penny for such a check."

"I will get it changed myself, Mr. Trevethick, at Plymouth. The bank will pass it, but I will write to-morrow, and within the week—"

"You shall not stay here a week, nor another twenty-four hours," roared Trevethick. "I have been made a fool of long enough. I will not listen to another word."

But he did listen, nevertheless. No longer hampered by vague fears and difficulties, with which he knew not how to grapple, but with a distinct plan of operations before him, Richard's eloquence was irresistible. Indeed, he was natural with him, had been practiced too often to lack the gloss of truth from his ready tongue. He actually had a scheme for getting rid of the sum in question, and when he possessed confidence himself, it was rarely, indeed, that he failed to inspire it in others. For the second time, the landlord of the Gothin Castle found himself in danger of being dragged by the persuasive arts of the young man's assertions, and by the force and flow of his glowing words. In spite of himself, he began more to think that he had been rude and been mistaken in condemning him as an impostor, after all. Richard had spoken of the sum in question, and when he possessed confidence himself, it was rarely, indeed, that he failed to inspire it in others. "TO THE CHARGE!"

[See Illustration on Page 625.]

"To the charge!" High the trumpet-blast rings on the air,
And the banners fly backward that bid us prepare.
Our swords will bite keenly; for surely we know
That the might of the Father-land strengthens the blow;
To the charge! and whoever is first in the fray,
The lilies of France are consquined to-day.

The Father-land bade us keep watch upon Rhine,
And we vowed that the wave should dead faces enshrine
Ere the foeman should triumph. The proud ripples gleam,
For it rolls for us still an inviolate stream:
While the pride of our footsteps for aye shall remain
On the plains of Alsace and the fields of Lorraine.

To the charge! that the Frenchmen may quail as they feel
The soul of the German is true as his steel—
We shall hurl back their legions, though blood runs like rain
On the vine-covered hill-sides of pleasant Champagne!
And the well-booted Eagle, with merciless beak,
Shall fly o'er the fields of their beautiful France!

We left those who love us afar beath the sky,
Where the foeman had hoisted his insolent flag!
The robbers had counted and portioned the spoil,
But their pledges have never pulled out well;
No trickier waves in the Rhinegland teeday—
The Tricolor's lookod of ill-luck for the fray.

To the charge! Dress your ranks and stand firm.
Then away.
Like a wave of the Baltic snow-crested with spray!
As the thunder-bolt strikes at the heart of the oak,
Charge down on the foe till he rock from the stroke!
And when the stern work of the battle is done—
Lo! from Elbe down to Danube our Germany's one!

SAVED FROM DEATH.

CLIVE and I were engaged to be married, and had been so about three months. We had known each other a great many years, and he often came down to the rectory, till one day, in a very unromantic manner, he asked me if I would be his wife; and though there had been many sighings and jealousies and heart-burnings we had read about, I knew then, in my foolish little way, I was very fond of Clive; and feeling how good and true-hearted and strong he was, and how glad I ought to be that he would stoop to such a poor little insignificant girl as I was, I looked up in his brave, handsome face, which I could hardly see for the tears swimming in my eyes, and then I said, Yes, I would; and then for a while I was clasped close to his manly heart, and sent to me that there could be no more care or trouble in this world, and all that I had to do was to stand close to be safe from the storms to come. He kissed me then, gently and lovingly, and somehow I felt very happy—so happy that when Uncle, who had brought me up from a child, came into the room I did not flinch hastily away, but went to him rather shyly, and to his arm, while Clive, in his bold, open way, said, "Mr. Grace, Mary has promised to be my wife."

Uncle shook hands with him warmly, and patted my head as he drew me nearer to him, and after that matters went on in a very quiet, unexciting way for three months, Clive coming down on Saturday night, and staying till Monday morning, when he returned to his office in the city, and in those days we used quietly to talk about the future: how in years to come we were to be married, and how we were to plan and contrive about our little income, taking a cottage somewhere six or eight miles from town, and living very sparingly, because Clive's salary was any thing but high. Our planning, though, was needless; for one day Clive came down in great haste, and I could see by his face that he had important news to communicate, and so it proved. He had been asked to be a partner, in a large merchant firm, whether he would like to accept another appointment.

"But is it advantageous?" I asked.

"Yes, he said, in a quiet, strange way; "six hundred a year."

"Six hundred a year, Clive!" I exclaimed.

"Why, we shall be rich!"

"Rich!" he said, taking my hand; "but there is a drawback."

"A drawback?"

"Yes, I must sign an agreement to serve them for six years certain."

"Well," I said, "but is not that advantageous?"

"Perhaps," he said, looking very hard in my eyes as he spoke. "But I have not told you where it is."

"Not abroad, Clive!" I exclaimed, as a sudden pang shot through me.

"Yes, love, abroad—in Java—at a Dutch station."

"But you can not accept it, Clive—six years —you will not leave me?" Then I looked myself, as I thought of my selfishness, and it struck me that I was going to be a stumbling-block in his path when a way was within his grasp.

"Do you wish me to give it up, Mary?" he said.

"Yes—no, no, Clive. I am selfish!" I exclaimed. "You must not throw it up—it would be destroying your future prospects. It were hard to bear—hard to wait for six years; but we must be patient."

I could say no more, for the tears I had striven to keep back would come; but the next moment he held me sobbing in his arms as he whispered, "Is there no other way of getting over the difficulty, darling?"

I looked up in his face, for, for a few moments, I did not see what he meant; but the next moment I was clinging to him, weeping silently. And so it fell out that at eighteen I was my dear husband's girlish little wife, so girlish, that, as we ascended the side of the great ship Batavian at Gravesend, I saw the sailors whispering to one another, and I felt my cheeks burn, because I knew that they were saying I was such a mere child. For it was all like a dream—that married wedding, and the hasty preparation for our voyage. My uncle had said that it would be suicidal for Clive to give up so good an appointment, and, though he felt it bitterly, he parted with Clive that six years was too long a separation. "Had it been three," he said, "we could have consented to the early wrench; but as it was for the longer period, he yielded easily to Clive's solicitations, and a week after the night all was settled; farewells had been said; and the great ship was slowly sailing down the ever-widening river.

It seemed so strange, so wonderful, that it required at times the constant thought of Clive's hand to make me realize the fact that we were bidding farewell to the old country. But as I gave and returned my last warm parting from my uncle, yet that sorrow was mingled with so much happiness that I fear I did not think enough of him.

The days glided by, even as the great ship glided past the shores of the English coast, and soon we had seen the last of the great rock-point which they told me was the Lizard, and we were far at sea.

Had I been a queen, I could not have had more attention paid to me. The captain, mates, and even the humblest sailor, always had a smile for me; and as we reached the Bay of Biscay I began to feel myself always a sunbeam, and the best place reserved for poor little me, wherever flying-fish, or dolphins, or a shark came in sight.

The days grew into weeks, and with almost invariably pleasant weather, the ship sailed on. There seemed no danger—nothing to apprehend; and as I sat with the soft breeze fanning my cheeks, all the perils of the sea of which I had heard seemed so distant and impossible that I could hardly believe the gentle rippling waves, and the soft-flecked sky, could ever possibly be guilty of the cruelties of which we hear.

At last, though, I began to feel that cloud that is sure to settle upon my husband's brow. I asked him the reason, and he unwillingly told me that it was the want of a ship's doctor.

It was upon one soft tropical evening that I chanced to overhear a remark of the captain's which led me to attend to him as we leaned over the side, looking down at the glittering starlight reflected from the dark waters of the sea.

"Are you keeping any thing from me, Clive?" I said, gently. "Am I not to share the trouble as well as the happiness of life?"

"Trouble, little one," he said—"trouble ought never to come near you."

"But I should not be happy if I felt that I did not share all, Clive. By keeping me in ignorance you make me feel that you love me less than you would screen me."

"Because of my own weakness," he said, lightly, and then, in an under tone: "I am uneasy, darling, about the vessel."

"Why?" I said. "What is there to make you uneasy?"

"Look down on the deck, and tell me what you see."

"What do I see? The man at the steering-wheel, the man on the watch, and the four men pumping."

Clive was silent.

"That makes you uneasy, then?" I asked, after a while.

"Darling," he said, "if you had not asked me, I should not have told you; but I can not bring myself to seem wanting in confidence. You will not notice any change in Captain Webster and Mr. Green?"

"They have seemed a little more cheerful and merry than usual," I said.

"In the cabin—yes; but when on deck, it has not been so. Mary, darling, I fear there is trouble at hand; those four men pumping looks ominous."

"Ominous!"

"Yes, love. Three days ago one man was employed pumping; the next day two men were at work at once, and they were relieved again and again yesterday, and are now employed all day till evening, to-day, it was commenced at daybreak, and orders have, I know, been given that it is to be kept up all night."

"And what does that mean?" I asked, though I felt that I knew what that question rose up in the bows.

"It means, love, that we are a thousand miles from any land, and that the ship has sprung a leak."

I was only a weak girl then, and very young, so that perhaps my emotion may be excused; but I felt a strange catching of my breath, and a sense of dread stealing over me; but I tried hard to master it all, and I don't think Clive knew me as I laid my hands on Clive's breast, and said: "Dear husband, we are in the hands of the Almighty; let us hope that He will preserve us by magnifying the peril."

He clasped his hands in his, and held me at arms' length for a few moments, gazing down in my eyes. "And I've been thinking you a timid little girl," he exclaimed. "Mary, darling, you are a heroine!"

and bathed my husband's forehead, though apparently without effect, for he lay motionless, his arms lightly circling me, and his eyes half closed; and then it was that, with my bodily power momentarily growing weaker, my mental faculties seemed to become more active, and my tears fell fast, as I thought how hard it was for him, so young and brave, to die thus early. At times I asked myself whether I was to blame—whether I ought not to have dissuaded him from accepting this post—to have been content with less brilliant prospects at home. I felt that it was not for me to say he had accepted it, and this was to be the end!

That long, long night passed; and with the rising sun I gazed upon Clive's face to find it still and placid as if in sleep. The captain, who was the only one who moved, seemed to me—for all I saw was in a dreamy, misty way—to secure the rudder, and then crawl forward, when he presently a scrap of biscuit into my hand, and some bottle would have poured a few drops between my lips, when one of the sailors assisted me. There was a moment's struggle, and the precious liquid fell over the side, the sailor making a dash at it, and licking off the salt water, to lay to with his face in the water, too weak to struggle back till the captain and that sailor also dragged him in; but the bottle was gone.

A time of bright golden mist, with a red-hot globe seeming to scorch my head, and a time of dense black darkness, the one mingling with and running into the other. Then, interminable lines of green fields and babbling streams, with delicious resting fruits hanging over the bright glistening waters. Then the old days, with Clive half supporting me as we wandered in the pleasant lanes, talking of the happy future. Then again, the golden glowing haze, and the burning heat, the muttering of voices, the soft fluttering of the sails, and the moon glowing like a globe of dense black darkness, the one mingling with and running into the other. SCENES ON THE RIVER MAIN.

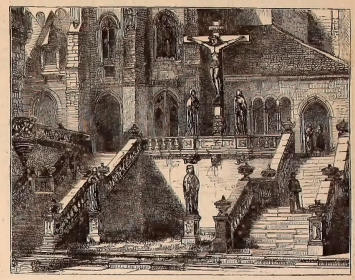
1.—BRIDGE AT FRANKFORT.



2.—CHURCH AT ASCHAFFENBURG.

THE majority of American sight-seers in Germany confine their tours to the Rhine, and know but little of the beautiful tributaries of that glorious river. One of these is the Main, on whose banks stands the old imperial city of Frankfort. Where it flows into the Rhine, at Mayence, the banks of the river are low and flat, and its stream is broad, slow, and muddy. The first place of interest is Frankfort, a city where some people think there is nothing to be seen except DANNECKER'S overrated statue of Ariadne. Such people are wrong. It is well worth while to walk through the quaint streets of the old town; to peep into the Cathedral, with its curious frescos, executed in 1427 by STEPHEN of Cologne; to view the modern paintings of the Römer; the remarkable church of St. Leonard; and lastly, the quaint old bridge, the subject of sketch No. 1 on this page.

At Aschaffenburg, where the tourist quits the railway, the beauties of the Main begin. The town is very prettily situated on the right bank of the river. The Castle first attracts the observation of the tourist, a remarkable building, with five lofty square towers, capped with bulb-shaped spires. It is now one of the numerous palaces owned by the King of Bavaria. Still more interesting is the "Pfarr" Church, or chief parish church of Aschaffenburg (the subject of the second sketch). Parts of it are very old, the nave being said to date from the ninth century. The plan of the building is remarkable, as the transepts, instead of being between the nave and the chancel, are close to the west end, while the cloisters surround the west end of the church. Here are three noteworthy monuments, namely, Cardinal ALBERT, of Brandenburg, a beautiful life-size bass-relief of the Virgin and Child, and a canopy supporting a sarcophagus which has crystal panels, and contains the body of a saint. This church stands on a hill, and is approached by a picturesque flight of steps.

Between Aschaffenburg and Würzburg the Main winds considerably, and the scenery is exceedingly picturesque. The river flows between lofty hills, with grand masses of rock projecting from them, and as ye approach Wertheim the vines are replaced by beautiful woods.

Wertheim lies at the junction of the Main and the Tauber, and at the point where the two streams unite stands the stately Watch-Tower (sketch No. 3). This Watch-Tower is more than one hundred feet high, and among the quaint roofs and gables of the houses to the right appears the curious spire of the parish church, while the whole scene is backed by the lofty hills on which stands the Castle of Löwenstein.

Next is reached the village of Zell, with its two secularized abbeys, one of which is used as a printing-office, and in it the first steam printing-press in Europe was established. The little town consists of one long picturesque street, hemmed in between precipitous hills and the river (sketch No. 4).

Directly the Convent of Hummelsporte is passed, Wurzburg breaks on the view, and presents a most attractively medieval appearance, looking more like the back-ground of a picture by Van Eyck or Memling than an actually thriving busy town. On one side of the river rises a grand rocky hill crowned by a castle, at the foot of this hill, and also across the river, are a cluster of gables, spires, and towers, backed by vine-clad hills (No. 5). The two parts of the town are joined by a fine old bridge with gigantic statues on each pier. The interior view of Wurzburg is somewhat disappointing. White-washy, tumble-down, and bourgeermeisterly. The streets, with the old brick and old city of the Prince Bishops of as much interest as possible. However, fifty years of modern vandalism have not sufficed entirely to destroy the grand monuments of eight centuries, and the numerous churches, hospitals, and convents with which the piety of a former time adorned this town still make it a place of considerable interest to the lover of art. The most ancient church is that of St. Burkhardt (sketch No. 6), and the part of Wurzburg which retains most of its old picturesqueness is that on the western bank of the Main.

The last sketch (No. 7) represents one of the immense pleasure-gardens in the neighborhood of Wurzburg, which are devoted especially to wine and beer drinking. Will our fair readers be horrified if we tell them that in these gardens the ladies of Germany are to be seen imbibing liberal quantities of these beverages? But such is the case. Whole families—parents, grandparents, and children of all ages—visit these gardens together, enjoying pleasant social intercourse or listening to music.

HITCHCOCK'S

HALF-DIME MUSIC,

AND TAKE NO OTHER.

Any Twenty Pieces mailed on receipt of $1 00.

☞ Please order by the Numbers.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The cheap system of Music in the United States and Canada was originated in the Fall of 1859 by BENJAMIN W. HITCHCOCK, of the City of New York; and by great expense the Half-dime and Ten-Cent or Dime Music Book was introduced into nearly every household. Both these Publications were issued under Copyright and as Trade Marks. Dealers as well as purchasers of Music can therefore readily discriminate between the deserving enterprise which has inaugurated a valuable and cheap community and the lack of moral honor which has induced unscrupulous imitators to endeavor to profit by the advertising and labor of the author of their series.

GUN-BOATS ON THE SEINE.

GUN-BOATS ON THE SEINE.

THE weakest side of Paris, so far as artificial fortification is concerned, would seem to be the northwest, in the wide interval between the fortress of Mount Valérien, overlooking the Bois de Boulogne, and the forts about St. Denis, due north of the city. But a double reach of the Seine, in its windings around the peninsula of Combevoie, Puteaux, and Asnières, just opposite the suburbs of Neuilly and Clichy, seems to offer good natural facilities for defense. Here, below St. Cloud, there is quite a fleet of gunboats, one of which is represented on this page. She is iron-plated, and the deck is also covered with iron. She has what a sailor would call a "forecastle," which rises above the level of the rest of the deck; and it contains two guns, which point forward on a line with the keel, with a slight training limit to each side. Having two large helms and double screw, like one of our own ferry-boats, she is intended to turn rapidly, so as to face her foes. There are six small projections on each side of the forecastle; these are probably shields covering loop-holes for musketry. These little craft may give the enemy a good deal of annoyance, but their plating is not sufficiently heavy to resist even 12-pounder shot.

BLOCKING UP THE CHANNEL OF THE WESER BY THE GERMANS.

WORN OUT.

You say that the sun is shining,
That buds are upon the trees,
That you hear the laugh of the waters,
The humming of early bees;
I am pleasured by none of these—
I am weary!

Let me alone! The silence
Is sweeter than song to me!
Down than Light is Darkness
To the one half loathe to see!
'Tis better to let me be—
I am weary!

I have faltered and fallen—
The race was but begun;
I am ashamed, and I murmur,
"Oh! that the day were done!"
How can I have the sun,
Who am weary?

What will you do for the flower
That is cut away at the root?
If the wing of the bird be broken,
What matter the bird is mute?
Oh, peace! and no more disputes—
I am weary!

I will give you a token—
A token by which to know
When I have forgotten the trouble,
The trouble that lives me so
That I can no further go,
Being weary.

When you shall come some morning
And stand beside my bed,
And see the wonderful pallor
That over my face is spread,
Shrink not. But remember I said
I was weary.

Then shall you search my features,
But a trace you shall not see
Of all these months of sadness
That have left their mark on me;
Then know that I am free,
Who was weary.

For the Old must fall and crumble
Before we can try the New;
We must taste that the False is bitter
Before we can crave the True.
This done, there's no more to do,
Being weary.

Duly to droop the eyelids,
Only to have the head,
And to pass from those who are singing,
"Alas! for our friend is dead!"
But remember how I said,
"I am weary?"

The point of view is just south of Paris, on the Heights occupied by the Prussians, overlooking northward over the city. FACTS AND PROMISES.

THE result of the elections in Maine and Vermont shows that the intelligent people of the country are not yet disposed to prefer the smooth promises of the Democratic party to the imposing and gratifying facts of Republican administration. Immediate interest in politics is undoubtedly concentrated upon the financial question. In the administration of General GRANT honest, efficient, and economical the financial question can be satisfactorily answered, it is enough. The "splendor" of administration, indeed, which was anticipated by some persons, does not appear in the faithful and steady care of the public interest which has thus far distinguished the Presidency of GRANT. But these is something better than splendor. An elaborate article in the North American Review for July arraigns the administration at substantially a failure. But the article, although pointedly and effectively written, is exactly not what it assumes to be—an impartial review of the administration. It brilliantly emphasizes some of its mistakes and failures, but it carefully omits any allusion to the considerations which entitle it to public confidence.

The article of which we speak elaborately criticises, for instance, the financial management of the administration. With much truth it says we are disposed to agree. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that the sole aim of the Secretary of the Treasury seems to have been to pay off the national debt immediately, and without sufficient regard for other considerations and the whole situation of affairs. But on the other hand, an administration which can show such financial results as those contained in the statement of the 5th of September from Acting-Secretary RICHARDSON, merits other mention than the indiscriminate censure which the article lavishes. The speech of Vice-President COLFAX at South Bend may also be diligently and profitably studied in illustration of the silent but much significant good work of the administration.

In brief, it appears officially that the net increase in the receipts of the government during the eighteen months from the 1st of March, 1869, to September 1, 1870, over those of the next preceding eighteen months was more than $87,000,000. The comparative decrease of expenditures during the same time was nearly $83,000,000. The whole amount gained by the increase of receipts and decrease of expenditures was therefore $170,000,000. During the same time the interest account shows a net decrease of more than $17,000,000, while in the eighteen months of the CLARK administration the public debt has been reduced nearly $170,000,000. All this has been effected, it will be remembered, by no increase of the rate of taxation nor of the articles taxed, but while Congress has been steadily reducing taxation, about $80,000,000 have been added to the last session alone. It is evident, from this statement, not only that the debt and taxation have both been reduced, but the public resources, in both collected and distributed more honestly and economically.

The form of such facts, which every intelligent voter in the country can understand, is not destroyed by the assertion that the tariff is clumsy and unequal; nor is a party which has produced such results likely to be displaced by the alleged assumedness of the theories of a secretary. A party is not displaced ideally. The practical question in politics is not one of abstract excellence, but of comparative efficiency. This fact the country has now before it, and to decide whether they will frame a perfect system of taxation, to be administered by infallible hands; but whether, taking all the facts together, the Democratic party is more likely to give us an honest and economical administration than the Republicans. The alternative is very simple. If the Republicans go out, the Democrats come in. And we have no doubt whatever that three-fourths of the intelligent people of this country would consider such a result a dire national misfortune.

It is not because the administration of General GRANT is what may be called "splendid," a word which is applied to it with a policy of the most injurious national tendency, nor because it has not made mistakes, nor because all those who support it are wise or honorable men, nor because there has not been much disappointment of many kinds, that it really has the confidence of the country; but because there is a universal and profound impression which, as we believe, the facts justify—that it is upon the whole an honest, fidelity the public welfare, that it has aimed at the highest character of public affairs, and that it has been able to prove its economy and efficiency in those very directions in which there is the greatest popular concern. No truly patriotic or thoughtful citizen is likely to carry his criticism of certain details of Republican administration to the point of conniving at the success of a party identified with financial frauds, with the mad extravagance of New York city government, which denies the validity of the new constitutional amendments, and would tear open every question which the war had finally to have settled. The elections in Maine and Vermont prove that the public judgment of the two parties is virtually unchanged.

MR. TWEED'S NOMINATION.

MR. TWEED has renominated as the Democratic Governor of the State Mr. JOHN T. HOFFMAN, the gentleman who signed the TWEED-Erie bill, by which the stockholders of the Erie road were deprived of the control of their own property. If Mr. HOFFMAN has any wish to sign that bill his political career would have ended. In the State of New York no Democratic convention can be set by the favor of Tammany Hall, and Mr. TWEED is Tammany Hall. The gentlemen whose names figure as sachems receive their orders from Mr. TWEED. The Democrats who affect to be independent, and to protest, are not only silenced by him, but presently cease to be princes. Indeed, the particular defects of our political methods were never so conspicuously revealed as they are now in the Democratic party management in the State of New York.

The late grave and well-considered speech in Brooklyn of General WOOD upon which, at the present, Governor HOFFMAN, as "a gentleman of scholarship, culture, of persuasive eloquence, and of rare personal refinement," argues his character as a private citizen, as a lawyer and as a judge, "of suspicion has ever been raised." General WOOD pointedly and truly said to state, in the strongest terms, the notorious fact that the administration owes its present official position to the most extensive and organized to the crimes of repeaters, ruffians, and ballies; and that he would "shrink, as from leprosy, were he called upon in private life to stand sponsor for such wrongs as he has fathered in his public and official career."

If this estimate of MR. HOFFMAN be correct, how extremely unenviable is his position! He knows that every intelligent man in the State of New York is aware that his political advancement is due to his utter subservience to certain persons, whom the editor of one of his party organs calls the authors of shameless frauds at the polls. He knows that the same great and intelligent multitude is aware that the signature of the Erie bill was the price of the continued favor of those who may most truly be called his political masters. The most conspicuous act of Governor HOFFMAN'S administration is an outrage so gross, a prostitution of official power so flagrant, that not a voice has ever been raised in its defense, and the friends can only pray for the charity of public forgetfulness. It is in vain that he and those friends assert that in all parties there are corrupt men, and that in his party is no worse than others. The glaring fact in his case is that, as Mayor, he virtually protected by proclamation the frauds of the corrupt men by which he was himself to profit, and that, as Governor, he has been the instrument of their plans.

If MR. HOFFMAN'S independent career had made his name familiar, and he had, by acknowledged services, invited the honors of his party—if he were, therefore, allied with Tammany upon equal terms, so to say, his position would be less humiliating. But he was selected by the managers of his party, not because of conspicuous services or capacity, but because they were sure of his obedience; and the result has justified their confidence. He fills the position once held by WILLIAM L. MARCY and SILAS WRIGHT, eminent members of his own party, with the single fact that every Governor elected by his predecessors? He knows only too well that the better part of his party, with all men of every party whose respect is worth having, ask themselves with shame, as they see in MARCY and SILAS WRIGHT sitting where MR. TAMMANY HALL would choose men to sit at the bidding of MR. TWEED and MR. SWEENY? Tammany Hall wanted the very man whom General WOODRUFF has described. It wanted a man who would consent to do as a public officer what he would spurn as a private gentleman; a man who acknowledged amiability and correct deportment would serve as convenient cloak for inexcusable public acts. It believed it had found this person in MR. HOFFMAN, and the event has justified its sagacity.

The position is an interesting inquiry whether MR. HOFFMAN is of opinion that political advancement may be bought too dearly. There is, of course, in all practical politics a certain amount of disagreeable detail. That is understood. It is the necessary friction of politics. But there is a line beyond which no self-respecting man is willing to go. To pass that is to reveal his weakness and his incapacity. The grave objection, therefore, to elevating MR. JOHN T. HOFFMAN to public office is not that the official conduct is controlled by the political principles of their party, which is properly exercised, but that they are powerless to resist the most fatal assaults upon the very foundations of the government. The frauds which MR. HOFFMAN, in his own denial and virtually protected would presently destroy the whole American political system; while the assault upon the public credit, the rights of industry, in the Erie bill, fatally disturbs the confidence in vested rights which is essential to the public welfare.

The true theory of the Democratic party, relying, as it does, upon ignorance, class hatreds, and electoral frauds, is so plainly fatal to American institutions now as it was when it was the defender and perpetuator of slavery. The qualities of MR. HOFFMAN, as shown in his public career, are not a temper and control this tendency; they only promote it by slightly veiling it. His official career, thus far, has brought shame upon the State; its continuance tends only to disaster.

PRUSSIA AND PEACE.

M. JULES FAVRE and many persons in this country who do not like to hold the republic, naturally decried the conduct of Germany in pushing forward to Paris as monstrous. But there is no doubt that it was right. The Imperial Government declared war against Prussia, and the French armies marched to invade Germany. The war, if not approved, was adopted by France. Instead, however, of invading Germany, and demanding the Rhenish provinces at Berlin, France found herself disastrously beaten in the field, her armies shut up in fortified cities, and at last her Emperor and the chief army surrendering. When the power of the Imperial Government was overthrown in Paris; a Government, or Committee of Defense, was improvised, which called itself the Republic, and its first words were that it was "a republic of war to the knife against the invader." What was Germany to do? Was the Prussian King to march quietly back to Berlin, or to believe the declaration of the new authority that it meant to continue the war? Was there any alternative? France had declared war, and, after great reverses, had overthrown the existing Government, in order to carry on the war more effectively.

But as the German army pressed steadily forward to Paris, the actual situation, the awful peril of the country, seemed to become more evident to the French authorities. They wanted above all things a respite, an armistice. The obvious method to obtain it was to go at once to the Prussian camp, and ask upon what terms peace was possible. But those authorities knew only too well that they could give no guarantees for the fulfillment of their own engagements with Prussia. They had seized the government in Paris, but that was all. The authorities of some of the other cities had acquiesced; those of still others had not; and Lyons was acting independently of Paris. The country, smitten and paralyzed with universal calamity, seemed to co-operate with the only apparent organization of authority. But the will of France had not been expressed. Knowing that, the Republic, or the Committee of Defense, saw the futility of going to meet the Prussian camp, and asked informally the mediation of England.

But England was, of course, perplexed by the same difficulty. She could not act for a French Government which France had not authorized; and she was utterly unable to show to the Prussian King that any terms which she might suggest, as agreeable to the authorities in Paris, would be ratified by the people of France. Neither those authorities nor England could say to Prussia that the terms which might be accepted would not instantly be thrust aside by a new revolution and a new form of authority. Prussia was not, and has never been, unwilling to treat; but obviously she could treat only with a Government which could bind France, and M. JULES FAVRE could not, and would not, assert that he represented such a Government. Indeed, in his official circular of the 26th of September, he concedes that the existing Government was in irregular and usurped power.

There was nothing to do, therefore, but to await the meeting of the Constituent Assembly. A congress of representatives, freely elected by the people, could speak for France, and nothing else could.

The conduct of Prussia, therefore, has been irreproachable. It has thus far been neither relentless nor cruel nor exacting. Meanwhile various false stories have been exposed, and many confidential conversations of BISMARCK have been reported. But whether he imputs the professions of state secrets to gentlemen whom he casually meets upon battle-fields may be wisely doubted. Yet, as the great German plan of the war has been kept, so the conditions of peace upon which Germany is likely to insist may, perhaps, be easily surmised. Such terms would be an indemnity, a reduction of the army, and the dismantling of certain fortresses. If, beyond this, Germany should demand the cession by France of Alsace and Lorraine, France might justly refuse to expatriate her own citizens by treaty, and demand that the question be referred to the people of the provinces. Should Germany refuse, and insist upon the cession without regard to the wishes of the people, she would forfeit much of the sympathy which has hitherto attended her. But we shall very reluctantly believe that the cold and intelligence which have been Germany the leadership of Europe will desert her at so important a crisis.

A DEMOCRATIC "PLANK."

THE people of this State and of the country will not fail to observe the position of the New York Democrats upon one of the most vital questions of the hour. They are perpetually begging for public forgetfulness of their conduct during and before the war. They convinced the intelligent country not to recall the fact that for a generation before 1860 the sole aim of the Democratic party was to control the interests of slavery, and that during the war it did what it could, short of armed assistance, to secure the overthrow of the government. By shrieking party before the war, and a Copperhead party during it, they naturally hates to remember, and begs every body to forget. But the Congressional Committee entreated the Southern voters to let other issues alone. But when directly summoned in the House to decide whether the amendments were final, the members of the committee all voted in the Senator INGERSOLL, of Ohio, in a late speech, described the whole system of reconstruction. The orators and the party all decline to declare that they acquiesce in the settlement, and Tammany Hall also refuses.

At its late convention in New York the party had an excellent opportunity to express its acquiescence. But the resolution which this topic is treated is more absurd than even such resolutions generally are. Here it is:

"Resolved, That, as many of the issues which have divided good citizens in the past ages are settled, we invite all conservative citizens, irrespective of former political associations, to unite with us in securing the ascendency in the government of the principle upon which it was established as such, viable, sustained by the majority of the American people, it secured peace and prosperity to all."

That is a resolution which, meaning exactly nothing at all, except a longing for the good old days of slave-driving, might be cordially approved by WADE HAMPTON and ROBERT TOOMBS.

This is the attitude of the New York Democracy upon the settlement of the war. It proposes to tear open every question if it has the opportunity. It scornfully rejects the counselors in its own ranks who feebly whisper that it is by cheining itself to a corpse that the party has suffered industry. It is a prodigious blun-dor which, as sincerely opposed to the party, we gladly perceive. It is a reckoning to which the Democratic managers may be very sure that their party will be held. They proclaim now the same disorganizing policy which they advocated in 1860, 1864, and 1868, and which, happily for the country and for civilization, totally overthrew them.

Let the voters of New York carefully consider whether they think it well for the peace and prosperity of the country to support a party whose open refusal to acquiesce in the valid work of the late amendments, and the finality of reconstruction, is a declaration of endless and fatal agitation.

OUR DUTY TO LIBERTY.

Is the Government now to be accused of hostility to a republic in France because the neutrality laws have been enforced against certain persons who had been enlisted to make war upon a power friendly to the United States? Is it desirable to have such laws, or is it merely undesirable to enforce them? Ought we to allow recruits to be enlisted here to fight against monarchical governments with which we are at peace, and should we only prohibit enlistments to fight against republics? In other words, are the United States to declare that they will take part in every war which calls itself republican, and are those who oppose such a policy, as fatal to republican security to be considered enemies of republican government? Certainly none can wish seriously more unworthy than we to make us what the French people to establish and maintain a republic. But that does not imply that we are to go to war to help them. It is only ridiculous can be proposed for any nation as that it shall declare itself the defender of liberty against all others. This was what the old French republic did—the republic which smothered liberty in blood.

The United States Government has enforced its laws in the case of France, as it has in that of Cuba. But nothing could be more unjust than to describe, for that reason, those who, in French or in this Cubans. It stopped Colonel RYAN's expedition last year. Was it because the Government wished to see slavery perpetuated in Cuba? It is said, indeed, that the insurgents had declared emancipation, and that to help them was to favor emancipation, if that had been the whole story it would have been a strong one. But it was really a very small part of the case. The same argument would have justified our sending expeditions to an insurrection in England which declared a republic, or to Ireland because it asserted its independence. In a word, it begins by assuming ground the circle again to the position that the United States ought to help every body who says that he is fighting for liberty, and help him without the slightest regard to the actual facts of the situation, or to the probable results to their own liberty or happiness. That is a course which no intelligent man and no sagacious party will ever propose. The sympathies and hopes of the people of this country are none the less warmly given to every honest struggle for liberty, wherever it may be.

THE FUTURE OF FRANCE.

It is with inexpressible sorrow that those who recall the bright and unbounded hope of France read of the devastation and desolation which have befallen its immediate victim. It is not easy to discover from the accounts exactly how great the destruction is, but, if the intention of defense of the city has been serious, the ravages of the neighborhood must have been immense. Paris is in a peculiar sense the pride of France. Indeed, there was many a Parisian who secretly felt it to be the glory of the world. In its perpetual carnival it amused itself with nothing more than satirical railing at Germany and the Germans. There was especial scorn in the Parisian laugh at the German soldier caricatured in le General Boum, because it was a German who served up the stew. How much was an evening of the "Grande Duchesse" be reliished by the golden youth of Paris with the King of Prussia and Count Bismarck as the chief actors? The assiduousness of the humiliation of Paris is as astonishing as its completeness.

And this dire humiliation of its royal, and all this unspeakable sorrow and loss, this total national decline, France owes chiefly to LOUIS NAPOLEON. His reign of eighteen years made now a kind of Circean revel. It appeared very splendid, and it was utterly demoralizing and fatal. Such has never been quite the case, and while it has been truly portrayed in COUTURE'S terrible picture in the Luxembourg, the "Decadence of the Romans." A French Century is not happiness. The policy of the French empire was that of the baser days of Rome, to amuse and excite the people, and blind by dazzling them. Paris, therefore, was beautified. The new avenues, the new boulevards, were magnificent. But the tone of imperial society was deplorable. The best Frenchmen did not appear in public affairs. They were the stern voices of warning and protest. Their attitude was that of the statues of the old Romans in COUTURE'S picture. Nowhere in the world, except in some American Democratic newspapers, did there seem to be any sincere admiration of LOUIS NAPOLEON or his empire. But what mere paste its apparent diamonds were, how utterly hollow its pretense of power or hold upon the people, the last few weeks have shown.

That nobody sees this more plainly than BISMARCK there can be no doubt. And the report that he would only treat with a resuscitated regency was therefore wholly improbable. To propose that BISMARCK should deal with the man with JULES FAVRE because he could not be sure that FRANCE was behind him, and yet insist upon treating with the man who made NAPOLEON when he knew that France had, at least, spewed him out, however obscure every thing else might be, was to suppose the most acute statesman of modern Europe of being deceived by a sophism which the merest doctrinaire would assert. The fact of all the papers lost and shame which LOUIS NAPOLEON has brought upon France will not be wholly in vain, nor to be altogether regretted, if they only serve to rouse the French people permanently to the conviction that they can hereafter yield to any form of personal power only at the peril of their very existence.

How terrible their fate under that system has been their own history, and the record on the earth by the old HOHENZOLLERN despotism, they were yet able to defy Europe, and to make their nationality more distinguished than ever. After the long succession of monarchical abuses since those days has prostrated France hopelessly. She will emerge from the present more humiliated than any great nation ever was in so short a time. Whether, indeed, there is the necessary intelligence to avail the part of the people to confirm and organize the republic is a question to be decided only by experiment. LOUIS NAPOLEON always insisted, the universal suffrage was his Minister of Public Instruction, DUPUY, to make education, as in Germany, compulsory and universal; and the masters of the city want a little less, say $225,000,000, they "reduce" the rate by five cents, a "reduction" which makes Mr. Johnson pay more than a third more, and which yields $7,615,472 more money than in 1866. Mr. ALLEN will probably vote the Tammany ticket with ardor.

The Governor of Utah has issued a proclamation peremptorily forbidding the musters and drills of the militia of that Territory except by his orders. This is a direct issue of authority with BRIGHAM YOUNG, and an emphatic suggestion to Federal officers and his fellow-citizens the laws of the United States will be enforced in all territory subject to their authority.

MR. ELIJIS H. ROBERTS, the editor of the New Era Herald, has been nominated for Congress with enthusiasm. We wish he might be elected with unanimity, and that Congress were altogether composed of such honorable and able men.

Putnam's Monthly, a magazine which will be always kindly remembered in our literature, will be hereafter merged with Hours at Home in Scribner's for the city of the same name, and published by HOLLAND. The great popularity of Mr. "Ticonah," and his skill in interesting and teaching the whole circle of readers, are the best auspices for the new periodical. Dr. HOLLAND'S own books, also, fresh from a residence in Europe, an experience which will give him the richest material. He is, however, so interesting a writer that Europe could only enlarge his sympathies, not alienate those from his own country.

It gives us great pleasure to be able to congratulate our returning contemporary, the New York Evening Mail, upon its success in the enterprise of a new and improved series of numerous competitors. Owing to the judicious management of J. M. BUCKLEY, this paper has for a long time stood at the head of the two-cent evening journals of this city. LAST YEAR its space was largely extended, and during the month of December it is proposed to issue a double sheet every Saturday.

We are glad to hear that our old friend BENJAMIN J. LOSSING has well known historian, has again returned to the lecturing field. He will lecture during the ensuing season on "ART: its History and Work," and on "Chivalry, Yesterday and To-day." We are sure that a lecturer so pleasant and instructive as Mr. LOSSING, and speaking upon such interesting and instructive topics, will be warmly greeted by the public as a familiar friend.

THE WAR—CURIOUS TYPOGRAPHICAL REMINISCENCES.

IT is among the curious things connected with the war between Prussia and France that there is scarcely a place of any note that late events have made us familiar with that has not an interesting reminiscence connected with printing.

KEHL, where the first work of destruction began by an attempt to destroy the bridge across the Rhine, is the locality to which Buskerville's beautiful type was transferred in 1779, having failed to procure a purchaser at home. M. BEAUmarchais, who bought it, opened an office in this town, and, at the expense of three millions of francs, published an edition of Voltaire's works, consisting of 20,000 copies, of which every one was sent on board for the Emperor of Russia, "who labored under weakness of the eyes."

METZ, which has acquired so much notoriety, was early distinguished by the introduction of printing. As early as 1482 a work was printed here (the first book of THOMAS A KEMPIS). In 1575 all Protestant printers had to quit the city, and all such authors had to get their works printed at Paris, or Rheims, etc., for more than twenty years.

STRASBOURG is well known to the learned as one of the towns that put in a claim to the honor of having been the birthplace of typography. Scholing and others contending that JOHN GUTENBERG printed here between 1440 and 1450; but this is unsupported by any positive evidence. The earliest dated book known to have been printed here is dated 1471. John Mentelin printed in Strasburg, in 1473, the first edition of the German Bible.

TOUL was a seat of early printing. The first known work on Perspective, by Jo. Pelegrino, was printed here in 1505; there are also in the show-case of literary curiosities in the British Museum. Toul is also to be noted as the place at which came out the earliest attempts at stereotyping was made in 1795.

At METZ a dated work was carried on as early as 1551. In 1552 was executed here the first edition of the Remish-English version of the New Testament.

At VERDUN printing was carried on as early as 1566. For this place the English prisoners who were detained by Napoleon I. printed, by his permission, a "Book of Common Prayer" in English.

SEDAN has also an interest to the lovers of typography. We are very grateful, says Mr. Cotton, "some very diminutive volumes, well known to the collectors of books by the name of Sedan editions—the 'Virgil,' dated 1675; the 'Horace,' of 1677, and the 'Greek Testament,' of 1680, are all of this kind at present known." In Trinity College, Dublin, is a Sedan volume dated 1389.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE recent interview between Jules Favre and Count VON BISMARCK, which has been progressing for some days, have proved an utter failure. Jules Favre submitted that the bond of union or guarantee of personal peace, and desired an armistice till the meeting of the Constituent Assembly, which would decide the question of peace or war. BISMARCK replied, temporarily, to the advantage of her present military position, that France had magnificent resources, and would prove a task that would give Germany, at the end of the armistice, it the Constituent Assembly rejected the terms, a position relative superiority as now.

The Germans commenced on purely military questions, VON MOLTKE pointing out that the necessity of the occupation of the fortresses, as they presented injury that must be compensated by France requiring the immediate material advantage. He named the surrender of Strasbourg, Toul, and Verdun—all fortresses of the first class—and the cession of Schlestadt, Neuf Brisach, and Belfort, with a small district around, as the movement of heavy guns, ammunition, and supplies, which were considered might be a material obstruction for the delay of an armistice. METZ was not mentioned, as it was to be the subject of negotiations between the Emperor and Marshal BAZAINE.

The unexpected moderation of these terms impressed FAVRE, who personally, it is believed, would gladly have accepted them; but he could not act alone, apart from his colleagues, and returned to Paris to consult. The Government, in view of affairs in the north, are bowing to the declaration of the enemy:

"Prussia has announced that she was in order to restore France to a normal state power. Prussia demands the cession of Alsace as far as Metz, and part of Lorraine. Before consenting to an armistice she demands the negotiations for peace. She will not treat with the Government, and will rather negotiate herself beneath her ruins. To such insolent pretensions we can answer but by resistance to the last extremity. France accepts the struggle, and counts upon her children."

The Government has issued decrees that all the national forces be called out as well as those for the Constituent Assembly, be suspended and adjourned, and all municipal elections be held on the 16th of October.

On the 23d of September Toul was surrendered to the Germans, and Strasbourg on the 28th. On the 27th of September the capitulation was signed which transformed the basis of negotiation at Soisan. There were 17,000 men in the garrison, 1,000 officers, 200 surgeons, of which 36 are killed, 600 wounded, 300 taken, 1,000 cannon, 10,000 rifles, considerable quantity of ammunition, quartermaster, and commissary stores.

The Provisional Government of New York Tribune at Berlin telegraphs that Bazaine, on September 19, sent a letter to the head-quarters of Prince Frederick Charles, which was transformed from thence to the King. It is stated that Bazaine, in this letter, offers to surrender on condition that the troops be permitted to march out with the honors of war, and to retain their arms and baggage.

Paris has been completely isolated. The Prussians, on the 19th of September, had a force of 200,000 men in action on the heights of Sevres, south of the city.

The Prussians occupied Rambouillet September 20, without resistance, and preparations were immediately commenced for the siege. The city of Paris has no chance to that city. A provisional government has been formed at Blois.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

EARLY on the morning of September 24 the Bremen steamer Hermann, Captain Schroeder, with forty-seven passengers, chiefly Germans, cleared from the port of New York. Soon after passing Hoboken Henry Hand and two French cruisers slowly moving across her path, and both quite close to the bow, she heard the discharge of about three rifles. The captain made three signals to the cruisers, and then hove to, and was boarded by a naval officer, Gowdy. Gowdy it is thought that the latter was sent probably the Savannah, which sailed from this port on the 23d, with special orders to the officers of the Hermann were at once conducted to consult with the captain. The engines were stopped, and in a few minutes the order was given to get about and return to American waters. At Quarantine the vessel came to anchor, and the passengers were shipped to the city, each one having been furnished with an order upon the company for the amount paid for passage.

The steamer Russia, Captain Judkins, left New York September 24 for Liverpool direct by way of Halifax, England. The opposition set has been accepted.

The Hon. JOHN C. NYE has been elected Senator at Rochester, September 21, and nominated John T. Hoffman for Governor, and Allan S. Rorer for Lieutenant-Governor.

EUROPE AND AMERICA OVERLOOKING THE VALLEY OF DEATH.—"WE SHRINK FROM CONTEMPLATING OUR LOSSES."—King William's Dispatch to Queen Augusta.

BRINGING UP THE GUNS.

(See Illustration on Double Page.)

HAVE you read in song and story
How the dead Napoleon comes,
Yearning still for earth-born glory,
And the war-beat of the drums?
Phantom legions file before him,
Far more than Dunsinane had,
While the eagles hover o'er him,
As exulting o'er the slain.

And he marshals his battalions,
Ranged upon the spectral soil;
Still, as the Armeda galleons
Vanished at the breath of God,
So the vision fades, and only
One remembrance doth remain,
Where a cypher pines lonely
On the shores of St. Helene.

When we read that gallant story
Our desponding spirits thrill;
France and Victory! France and Glory!
Seem familiar phrases still.
And if in the evening ages
We have need of battle-cry,
We can seek historic pages—
Think of Austerlitz—and die.

Once our cannon spoke in thunder,
And all Europe heard in dread;
Now, O France, there's not a murder
And thin army locks a head:
Yet, an ounce of salvation,
While this agony shall last,
Hope, amid the desolation,
Fairer future from thy past.

Still as sweeps the storm of iron,
Where the cannon crests the ridge,
And the battle-clouds environ,
Die with thunder on Lodi bridge:
Lo, the golden lilies paling,
France has save need of her sons;
Ther shall answer her unfailing
While one lives to mon the guns!

CHAPTER XXI.

THE MISERS' BANK.

As, though Richard had found long, he could not find out, so, though he was familiar with the travel of the last two days, he could not sleep. He turned from side to side on the hard pillow throughout the weary night, and strove to lose himself, and shut out thought, in vain, even for an instant. He got up and paced the room, and, when the streaks of dawn began to show themselves over the blind, and the world forth, in two, whose presence only served to intensify its solitary grandeur, the thirty-six hours of his life fore him. But as yet there were no tokens of waking life: the streets were empty, the windows shrouded, and a steady drizzle of rain was falling, which gave promise of a wretched day. Even when the morning advanced, it was difficult to make out the individual buildings; but he had had the Misers' Bank pointed out to him on the previous day, and he thought he recognized it now. It was there that the business which he had proposed to himself was to be effected, and he gazed at it with interest. The wisest of us are simple in some things, and though so knowing in the ways of the world—that is, of his world—Richard knew nothing of banks and misers, and wondered whether he would have any difficulty in carrying out his object. He could not foresee any; it seemed to him that the banking clerks would be glad to oblige him in the matter in question, since, if there was any advantage, it would be on their side. But there were six hours yet before he could perform this business, and since sleep was denied him, how was he to pass the time? There was a good fire in the book upon the drawers, which he had not hitherto observed, with the royal arms above the mantel-piece, and the name of the hotel inscribed beneath them. It did not look like a devotional work, but it was the New Testament—a work that was very literally new to Richard Yorke. He had seen it, of course, often; it was presented to every child with its contents, and had joked about them. It is the easiest book in the world to make jokes upon, which, perhaps, accounts for it's being a favorite a subject of ridicule with foolish persons. Shakspeare is also easy to make fun of, but the bouffes of blasphemy is in their way startling, which, to many, forms the chief charm of witty conversit. Richard looked at it as a book to read at a stick; but he took it up, and opened it at random. "Having no hope, and without God in the world."

He was not a believer in sortilege. If the text he had chanced upon had been ever so applicable to his own condition, it would have made but little impression upon him, and in this was not very pertinent in its application. He was not without hope without hope. He had come to Plymouth full of hope, though disappointed at its not having been already exchanged for certainty. He had good hope of inspiring John Trevethick with confidence in his social position, and consequently of obtaining his consent to marry the woman who had now become independent of his hospitalities. He had even some hope of yet inheriting a portion of his father's great estate. He could not be accused of spiritual ambition. Any contributors of hope than that of being in a position to enjoy himself thoroughly had never entered into his mind. Just now, however, he was far from enjoying himself; he was a prey to anxiety, and any opportunity of forgetting it was welcome to him. Not without an effort to be interested, therefore, he reflected upon these words, which seemed rather to have been spoken in his ear aloud than merely to have caught his eye. He had already shut the book with contemptuous impatience, but he found himself, nevertheless, repeating: "Having no hope, and without God in the world," and pondering upon their meaning. He wondered at himself for taking the trouble to do so; but if he didn't do that, his thoughts would, he knew, be even less pleasant to occupy, so he let him dip into the novel by channel. How could a man be without God in the world, if God was every where? he had been somewhere once, heard sermons, and which he believed to be the fact. It was one of the objections against the Bible, was his positive conviction, that it was self-contradictory in its assertions, and unmistakably distinct only in its denunciation of wrong. Here was a case in point, and one which might justly be "taken up" by a fellow, if he was worth while. As for himself, he was no skeptic. Exeter Hall might have clasped him to her breast (and would) upon that ground. He was accustomed to see the name of the Creator whenever he wished to be particularly profane; but for what reason he could not have named it with his taught him to do so. She had never spoken to him on religious subjects except in humorous connection with the Heads of the Church, to which her late good husband had belonged—Emanuel Swedenborg and Joanna Southcott. If the expression "without God in the world" meant the lack of such a selfish out the practice of religion, it certainly did have an application to himself, but for other reasons. He was not without God acquainted. Of course he had known people who went to church—young men of his own age, whom their parents compelled to do so, and who envied him the liberty he enjoyed in that respect; and the poor lads at Gethin went to chapel. But, even there, shrewd fellows like Trevithick and Solomon did not trouble themselves to do so. Mr. Gethin went! But then women, unless they were uncommonly clever, like his own mother, always did go to the parsons. Parsons, as a rule, were hypocrites. He had met one or two of them in town under circumstances that showed they had really no more "nonsense about them" than other people, but in the pulpit they were bound to talk. Look at Mr. Wylie, Gethin's instance—the best specimen of them, by-the-by, he had ever known—who could preach like fire and was wholly set upon the main chance? To what slights and insolences did that eloquent humbug of a parson subject him! Not that he cared for it, he had counted upon that fat living, of which the Squire had so cruelly disappointed him, as a prize in a lottery, but this was Carew himself, with thirty thousand a year, and did not spend a shilling of it on anything. He had left him a mere pittance a portion of his wealth, by way of insurance—instead of handing it over to the man to whom he had given him a bed-candle not many hours before.

"What! still up, my man?" said Richard, grimly.

"Yes, Sir. The morning mail has but just come in, and I had to open a letter for the gentleman in the room under you; but he seemed a quiet one, and I didn't think he'd 'a disturbed me."

"He did not," said Richard. "I have been awake all night, and now wish to hear no more him. Can I have some hot water?"

"Not yet, Sir, I'm afraid; there's no fire kitchen, and the cook's not come down to broil and-soda, Sir.

"No, no," answered Richard, smiling; "I that's what I want; and as for the hot water, I can do without it; but, now you're here, just tell me, for I am quite a stranger to the town, is there that high roof yonder," and he pointed to the object in question, "the Misers' Bank?"

"Yessir, that's it. At 10 this morning was but a little fixer, you would have a lovely view from this here window, Sir, as is one of the good slice of the harbor! There's a splendid building out to the left there, if the clouds would but lift for a minute to do them justice, Sir."

"Indeed," said Richard, carelessly, and turned away. "Just take my boots down with you, no I shall want them as soon as you can get them cleaned."

The man did as he was bid. Directly he had left the room, Richard opened the door, locked and bolted it, and stepped to a chair. Perhaps want of food and sleep had weakened him; but he sat down, and, though very pale and haggard, he was one who has received a sudden shock. Why should one man have answered him last night, "the convict ship," and now this fellow have pointed out the jail? It was only a coincidence, of course; and if there was ever such a thing as an evil augury, he had surely experienced it on those two occasions. He had a vision of some one burying one's self at Gethin," thought he, smiling faintly at his own folly. "If I stand there much longer, I shall begin to believe in mermaids and the Flying Dutchman." Jail! Why, if the very worst should happen, the matter would only require to be explained; he was in no real peril from the law, after all. Indeed, the very revelation which he most dreaded would only, by exposing the true state of affairs, precipitate his happiness. Trevethick would then be as eager as himself to hasten Harry's marriage.

That he answered until something of equanimity returned to him. Then he attired himself, buttoning his frock-coat carefully over his chest, and brushed his hair. As he reached the next landing, a gentleman emerged from the room immediately beneath his own, half dressed, fully dressed, and carrying his hat and great-coat. He was a small stout man, with bushy red whiskers, and a florid complexion, and little twinkling black eyes. With a civil bow he made way for Richard, who passed him, and then followed him down stairs into the coffee-room. It was a huge apartment, and quite empty except for their two selves. A business meeting in such a locality would have exchanged a salutation; and Richard, not gregarious by nature besides, being eager to divert his thoughts, at once entered into conversation.

"You are the gentleman who arrived by the mail this morning, I conclude," said he, "otherwise you would scarcely have been astir so early."

"Just so, Sir," answered the other, smiling. "I thought it was not worth while to go to bed, but just bathed and had a wash and brush up, and here I am, sharp-set for breakfast."

It was plain this man was not a gentleman; but Richard cared very little about that. He would have talked to the waiter, in default of any other companion.

"Well, I have been to bed," said Richard, smiling, "though something I took at dinner disagreed with me, and kept me awake all night. Do you mean to say you are not going to take any breakfast or refreshment at all?"

"Well, no; I had some sleep in the coach, and a very little of that article does for me. If I can get a cup of tea, Sir, enough, as I do, it is more than I generally get on without treat."

"Then," said Richard, "I should like to see the substitutes you take for what I have always found an indispensable necessity. Suppose we breakfast together, and you shall order it."

"But not pay for it," stipulated the stout gentleman, ih a tone that you might take as either jest or earnest. "We'll go shares in that, eh?"

"Unless you will allow me to be your host, we will certainly go shares," said Richard, who was determined to have no will in all Gethin so great a hoor as this could be found above-ground or underground, and rang the bell. Business on the waters, but rather amused nevertheless.

"I don't like misunderstandings," explained the fat little man, "and I am not yet obliquitous. It's not that I grudge my money, or have not as much as I need—but—but—I haven't."

"Then you've got more than any body else I know," said Richard, laughing; "and I am accustomed to that. Here's meat too."

"I dare say, Sir; you are a rich man yourself, I dare say, Sir," said the hungry gentleman with plenty of money in your pocket."

At any other time Richard would have been disgusted with such an observation, but he was, moreover, a perfectly just one. He looked from head to toe, like a young man of fortune, and had been brought up as silly and uselessly as any such; but now he blushed and felt uncomfortable. He put his fingers, in spite of himself, sought that breast-pocket which he had so carefully buttoned up, as though his companion's observation had given a local and material meaning.

"Do you know Plymouth?" asked he of the stranger, by way of turning the conversation.

"Perfectly. Indeed, I live here; but I did not expect to find myself at home at such an unreasonable hour as the coach comes in. If, as a resident, I can be of any service to you, pray command me. But you don't eat, Sir."

Richard, indeed, was only playing with a piece of toast, which his fingers and brain mechanically were disagreeing with marvelous rapidity down the back-stairs of his imagination.

"I am not like you," he answered. "Want of sleep produces want of appetite with me. With respect to Plymouth, I am a stranger; I will offer me your hospitality, but—"

"Services, Sir, services while in the town, I said," observed the little man. "Let us have no misunderstanding, nor yet obligation; that's my motto. So long, Sir, and I do for you, short of that?"

"Well, I shall not greatly tax your prudence," rejoined Richard, this time laughing heartily, "though you must certainly be either a Scotchman or a lawyer, to be anxious to set at 'with out prejudice.' The only information I have to ask of you is, at what time the bank opens; for I have got some business to do there, and don't want to effect as soon as possible, and then be off."

"The bank! Well, there's more than one bank in Plymouth," observed the little man, scraping up the crumbs of marmalade on his plate. "They open at different hours."

"The Misers' Company is the one I want to go to."

"That opens at nine, Sir. It's on my way home, and I will be glad to show it you."

"Thank you; but it was pointed out to me last night," said Richard, stiffly: for he preferred to effect the business which he had on hand alone. "It is still raining. What do you say to a cigar in the smoking-room?"

"With pleasure, when I have just written a receipt in the coffee-room of my private," answered the stranger; "however, I can do that as well there as here."

And so could he seem for Richard's society that he had pen and paper brought into the hotel divan, and from thence dispatched his note.

"Take one of my cigars," said Richard, good-naturedly, offering his case.

"No, no," replied the little man, shaking his head, and looking very grave; "you know my motto, Sir.

"A cigar," urged Richard, "is one of those things that one can accept even from a stranger without that sense of obligation from which you shrink so sensitively. Seriously, my good Sir, I shall feel offended if you refuse me this small favor."

"Sooner than that shall be, Sir, I'll take your cigar," said the little man. He held it up to the light, and sniffed at it with great zest. "This is no common brand, I reckon."

"Well, I think it better than you will get out of the waiter's box, I dare say," answered Richard, smiling; for his cigars, like every thing else he bought him, were of the best.

"Now I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll put this in my pocket, if you'll allow me, young gentleman, for a treat when I get home. After an early morning breakfast, I generally prefer a pipe, and he produced one accordingly from his pocket.

The man was melancholy to the last degree, being lit only from a sky-light; relics of the last night's dissipation, in the shape of empty glasses and cigar ends, were still upon the small round tables: while a two-days-old newspaper was the only literature of which the apartment could boast.

"This place and hour would be dull enough, Sir," said the stout society, "under any circumstances," said Richard, good-humoredly, smiling. "I don't think I was ever up so early in my life before, nor in a den of a place."

"It's reckoned a good inn, too, is the George and Vulture; but the life of a hotel, you see, Sir, is much the same as in the city."

"That's a pity," said Richard, laughing, "as that's have the opportunity of seeing a bit of it been. I'll be away by 9.30, or 10 at latest."

"Ah," said the little man, "indeed!" His words were meaningless enough, but there was really a genuine air of interest in his tone. He was a man of feelings, no doubt; but Richard rather liked him, acutely because it was evident that he was not accustomed to be liked. He had laid himself out to please John Trevethick and his friend Solomon for the last six months, without success, but here was a man who had evidently appreciated him at once. If he was but a specimen of something of that sort, it was only the more creditable to his own powers of pleasing; and his vanity—and Richard was as vain as the best of gentlemen in a small the centre door was heard. "Thief, thief! thief, thief!" were the words it said.

"How much is there?" inquired the clerk, taking the bundle of notes from Richard's hand; and his voice sounded as though it was uttered in an empty room.

"Two thousand pounds," said Richard. "Is there any difficulty about it? If so, I can take them elsewhere."

But the clerk had got them already, and was beginning to put down the number of each in a great ledger. Richard had not calculated upon this course of procedure, and had his reasons for objecting to it.

"80,431, 80,432, 80,433," read out the clerk aloud, and every soul in the room seemed listening to him.

"I will do," said another voice close to Richard's ear, and a light touch was laid upon his arm. Scarlet to the very temples, he looked up, and there stood the little red-whiskered man from whom he had parted ten minutes before. A very grave expression was now in those twinkling black eyes. "I have a warrant for your apprehension, young man, upon a charge of theft," said he.

"Of theft!" said Richard, angrily. "What nonsense is this?"

"Those notes are stolen," said the little man. "Your name is Richard Yorke, is it not?"

"What is that to you?" said Richard. "I decline—"

Here the door of the manager's room was opened, and out strode Solomon Coe, with a look of cruel triumph on his harsh features. "Ha, ha! your man, right enough," said he. "Heed wheedle the devil, if once you let him talk. He set off with him!"

The next moment Richard's wrists were seized, and he was hurried out between two files of the curious inhabitants of the hotel and a policeman—down the bank steps, and into a fly that stood there in waiting.

"To the County Jail!" cried Solomon, as he entered the vehicle after them. The door closed to the red-whiskered man, and inquired fiercely, why he hadn't put the darbies on the scoundrel.

"Never you mind that," was the sharp reply. "I'm responsible for the young gentleman's safekeeping, and that's enough."

"Young gentleman! I am sure the young gentleman ought to be much obliged to you," replied Solomon, contemptuously. "Young fellow, you mean."

"Nobody's a felon until after trial and conviction," observed the little man, decisively. "Let's have no misunderstanding and no obstruction, you two; that's my motto."

Here the fly began to rumble, and a shudder fell over the vehicle and those it held: they were passing under the archway of the jail.

CHAPTER XXII.

LEAVING THE WORLD.

WHAT wondrous and surpassing change may be in store for us when the soul and body have parted company one does not know. But of the changes of which man has experience in this world, there is probably none so great and overwhelming as that which he undergoes when, for the first time, he passes the material barrier that separates guilt from innocence, and finds himself the inmate of the criminal law. To be no longer in the chaises of the prisoner, and to be no longer a free man is a thing hard to realize; the shock, of course, is greater or less according to his antecedents. The habitual breaker of the law is entirely what sooner or later to the "stone jug" he must come; his friends have been there, and laughed and joked about it, as Eton boys who have been "swished" make merry with the block and rod, and affect to despise it; the situation is, in short at least, familiar to him; yet even he, perhaps, feels a sinking of the heart when the door of the principal cell opens upon him for the first time, and shuts him from the world. The common liberty to go where he will is estimated, while we have it, at nothing; but, once denied, it becomes the most precious boon in life. How infinitely greater, therefore, must be the feelings of one thus unhappily circumstanced, to whom the idea of such a catastrophe has never occurred; who has always looked upon the law from the vantage-ground of a good social position, and engagements in a working with conscience, as in something which could have no personal relation to him self!

Thus it was with Richard Yorke when, for the first time, he found himself a prisoner in the hands of Mr. Dodge, the detective, and his theocratic assistant. For the time he felt stupefied; unmanned, and might have even fainted, or burst into tears, but for the consciousness that Solomon Coe was sitting opposite to him. That Solomon Coe was sitting opposite to him, and that the latter was the fact he owed his misfortune to, that he despised more than words can tell him to the quick, but at the same time gave him an outward show of calmness: he could not be the broken down before that man, though he had been standing beneath the gallows-tree. The spondency would have utterly prostrated him, but for hate and rage—hate of his rival and all who for his sake had risen in estimation against what might be concerned in this catastrophe—and rage at the arrest itself. For, though he had not the consciousness of innocence to support him, he had no sense of guilt. He had had no intention of absolutely stealing Trevethick's money; and yet he foresaw how difficult it would be to clear himself of that grave charge. He also looked back, and perceived for the first time the magnitude of the folly which he had committed in not making known for it is a crime—he had not principle enough for that; but he recognized the evicis enough for that; but he recognized the evicis enough for that; and its mad audacity; ten of the imprudence, and its mad audacity; yet he was mad and audacious still. He had been brought up as much his own master as any youth in England, no matter how rich or nobly born; he had never known control, and even except during those few days at Crompton) what it was to control himself; and he could not realize the fact that he might actually compel to leave the fate of common thieves; to wear a prison garb; to be shut up within those walls for months or even years: no longer a man, but a convict, known only by his number from other jail-birds. He did not know that he was about to be standing in the felon's dock, subject to the curious gaze of a hundred eyes, the indifferent regard of the stern judge. In the midst of these bitter thoughts, which were indeed disputations with his fears, the fly drove through the jail gate, and Mr. Dodge, with a cheerful air, observed: "We must get out here, if you please, Mr. Yorke."

Richard hesitated; he was mistrustful of his very limbs, so severely had the sight of those same walls shaken him.

"Your young friend does not seem much to like the idea of lodging with us," said Solomon, with a brutal laugh.

"That is fortunate," answered the detective, dryly, "since he will not have to do so. In my profession, Mr. Coe, we hold it a mean trick to kick a man when he is down. This way, if you please." For, at the sound of Solomon's voice, Richard was up and out in a moment. "It is merely a form that you have to go through before we go before the bench."

"A form?" asked Richard, hoarsely; "what form?"

"We shall have to search you, Sir; that's all."

"That's all," echoed Solomon, with a grin.

Richard's face frowned from white to red, from red to white, by turns.

"Mr. Coe will stay where he is," said Dodge, peremptorily, as he led the way into a little room that opened from the gate-keeper's parlor.

"I thank you for that, Mr. Dodge," said Richard, gratefully.

"Not at all, Sir. If you have any thing of a compromising character about you, discovery or such like—that's my business and the beak's, not his—Officer do your duty."

Richard was searched accordingly. He had no revolver; but what astonished himself more than it did the detective, was to find a cigar case in his breast-pocket.

"Why, this must be the one that you gave me this morning, Mr. Dodge."

"Just so, Sir. I put it back again as we came along. You know me again—which I hope it be soon—then I'll smoke it with you with pleasure. If I keep it by me, I am careful, you may depend upon it, and baccer is a thing as don't spoil. That's a good cigar, I expect it now—for it."

Mr. Dodge's remark referred to a gold locket, with the word "Harry" outside it, written in diamonds, and within a curl of hair; her, which he had executed himself.

"That's a present from a young lady, Sir," said Richard, sadly.

"No doubt, Sir, no doubt. There's no charge against you except as to these notes, that must put it down as I found them on you; but I say, but you can keep it, and welcome, so far as I am concerned; though I am afraid the Cross Key folks will be so very easy with me."

"The Cross Key folks?"

"Well, Mr. Yorke, it's no use to hide from you that you will be sent to Cross Key; that's a prison, young gentleman, for the time being, for those as are committed, and the beak will be the man to say whether you are committed, ask to see your friends have money, I conclude. Hush! Here's the water, young man; just sip a little, drink it all up, there's a good."

Not another word, either then or afterward, did Mr. Dodge exchange with his prisoner. Perhaps he began to think he had acted contrary to his duty in speaking, chatting with the officer who would will he had already shown him. Perhaps he resented the favorable impression that his conversation had created in his acquaintance at the hotel had made upon him as unprofessional. At all events, he was entirely grave and stern—a mood of affairs where the magistrate was sitting—it was not open at the hour when Richard was brought before him, and he had been searched there—Mr. Dodge seemed to have lost all sympathy for his "young gentleman," chatting with the officer quite carelessly upon matters connected with their common calling, and even offering Mr. Coe a pinch from his snuff-box, without extending that courtesy to Yorke. Nay, when they were just at their journey's end, and the fly was about to turn into the prison-yard, he gave the word for him to halt, and whistle an enlivening air. The method was not so popular as it has since become, or perhaps Mr. Dodge had doubts of his ability to render it with accuracy, but, as if to inform all whom it might concern what it was that he was executing, he hummed aloud the fag-end of the tune, keeping time with his fat spun his knee, "You gave the vessel, you gave the vessel."

Richard understood, and thanked him with his eyes. He had no need, however, to be reminded of the good-natured detective's word of advice. The passenger which he had just undergone had had the effect of revealing to him the imminence as well as the full extent of the peril in which he stood. Henceforward he could think of nothing—not even revenge—save the means of extricating himself from the toils which every moment seemed to multiply about him. The time for action was, indeed, "over" to be sure, but it was over for already—"over" to be there; other folks in difficulties besides our hero, are apt in consolation and excuse to look to their course of conduct before my Lord the Judge. Mr. Dodge, however, assured Richard, that he would have no need to undertake the attorney after him that very night.

The road to Cross Keys was, for many miles, the same which he had lately traveled in the reverse direction; yet how different it looked now! The hills, the rocks, the streams were the same, but Richard then had ever thought them, but they mocked him with their beauty. The sun, which had then so gladly fed the springy turf, the yielding heather, beneath his feet; to love his hands in the sparkling brook, had now grown cruel, and hot in the blessed sun. Perhaps he should never see them any more—these ordinary, everyday beauties, on which he had scarcely taken any account when they were freely offered for his contemplation. He looked back even on the day before, wherein he had certainly been wretched enough, with yearning regret. For, at least, he had been a free man, and when should he be free again? Ah, when! He was, as it were, in a prison on which the key had been thrown away, and leaving quite hopeless, even had it been judicious to make the attempt. His only consolation was that Solomon Coe was no longer with him to jeer at his deserted locket. He had started for Gretton under the news, doubtless as welcome to Trevethick as to himself, of the prisoner's committal. Why would Harry say when she heard of it? What would she not suffer? Richard cast himself back in his seat, and groaned aloud. Mr. Dodge cast a furtive exchanged a glance with his companion. "He is guilty, this young fellow," said the detective to himself. "They had their reasons for such occasions.

The day drew on, and the soft sweet air of evening began to rise. They had stopped here before for refreshments, but Richard had taken nothing; he had, however, partaken of wine under the curious eyes of the country town-loiting-places. He was afraid of the crowd that might gather round the door to which he had that was being taken to prison. There was nothing to mark him as such, but it seemed as if the whole world could by know it. He welcomed the approach of night. They still traveled on for hours after it was his habitual time for retirement, at which he could be placed in safety on the road; at last the wheels rumbled over the stones of a little country town, they stopped before a building similar, so far as he could see by the moonlight, to that which he had left in the morning, but at Plymouth: all jails are alike, especially to the eyes of the prisoner. A great door was opened, there was a parley with the keeper of the gate. The whole scene resembled something which Richard remembered to have witnessed in a dream, he knew not what, nor where. A door in the wall was opened; they led him up some stone steps, another door stood open, there was a clang; and its locks seemed to bite into the stone.

"This way, prisoner," said a gruff voice.

Door after door, passage after passage: a labyrinth of stone and iron. At last he was delivered up to small chamber, unlike any thing he had ever seen in his life. His sleeping-room at the keeper's lodge at Crompton was a palatial convent with it. The walls were stone; the floor of a shining brick; there was a little iron bed, and of a shining brick. His jailer-chamberlain pointed to a low-lying hammock, stretched upon two iron bars, between the walls.

"There, there, tumble in," he said; "you will have your bath in the morning. Look alive!"

Richard obeyed him at once. "Good-night, warder," said he.

"Warder!" grumbled the other; "it's nonsin'. A pretty time to be knockin' up people at a respectable establishment with such names as that—bolts and bones, or deviled kidneys"—for the man was a wag in his quaint way—"ring this ere bell. As for the other rules and regulations of her Majesty's jail, you'll learn them at breakfast-time."

The door slammed behind him.

How the doors did slam in that place! And Richard was left all alone. If, instead of the metal ewer of water that stood by his bed-head, there had been a glass of deadly poison, he would have seized it greedily, and emptied it to the dregs.

EFFECT OF THE MITRAILLEUSE AT GRAVELOTTE.

IN our issue of August 20, on page 532, we gave a correct representation of that fearful weapon of modern warfare, the mitrailleuse; and to-day, on page 644, we lay before our readers a sketch taken on the spot, at Gravelotte, showing the effects produced on the Prussians by the concentrated discharge of the thirtyseven barrels constituting the piece.

Terrible as may be the horror resulting from the fire, it is not yet quite certain that the advantages ascribed to the mitrailleuse are not the vantages ascribed to the mitrailleuse are not the counterbalanced by defects. However, the crucial test is being furnished by warfare such as that in which it is now being employed, and the rejection or final adoption of the weapon may well be determined for other nations by the experience gained to it by the French and Prussian governments.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ADVICE TO FREE-EATERS.—Deal gently with the hereafter.

A gipsy woman promised to show two young ladies their husbands' faces in a pail of water. "Can't see mine," exclaimed one, "why, there's two faces." "Well," said the gipsy, "those faces will be your husbands' when you are married."

Some of the questions proposed for discussion at a meeting of a Western debating club were these: "Is it necessary that a woman should remove a thorny litter-ary obstruction?" "Can a pedestrian walk against time?"

A new mission at New Bedford took a stroll before the public on the first Sunday he was there, and after walking about with locks over his eyes for a time, looking individual wits: "You needn't look any further, for I'm the only one in town."

An unfortunate Indian missionary has had his sermon reported as follows: "The speaker was a dedicated man, and spoke of the dedication of Solomon and his skill in waving trees." The unhappy preacher wrote a letter to the reporter, in which he asked to be excused, but published this excuse, to say that he was a Dedicated man, and spoke of the dedication of Solomon and his talent not as waving trees, but sowing seeds.

An inebriated individual fell down a flight of steps, and was picked up, and a passer-by asked him seriously injured, ran to pick him up. Before he could effectively suggested, "Let him alone, he'll get up himself. What no one stood out? "Now, my friend, I will take down stairs that way."

"Why, Bill, what's the matter with you? You look green in the mouth." "Well, Peter, I dare say if you'd been where I have, you'd look green, too." "Why, what's the matter?" "Well, you know Sarah Swipes?" "Yes, I know her." "Well, I kissed her last night." "You did! What for?" "Well, I'll tell you. I'd no idea she was going to kiss me, and I'd cleared my grit that would treat me in that way."

In the graveyard at Chilliwack, England, are the following epitaphs:

"Here lies the body of John Smith,
Buried in the 49th year.
If he don't jump at the last trump,
He'll sleep right here."

"Here lies me and my three daughters,
Brought here by using Seidlitz waters;
If we had stuck to Epsom salts
We wouldn't have been in these vaults."

The way to treat a man of doubtful credit is to take his note.

A lady in Syracuse is said to rest her head on a gearnear while sleeping, in order that she may dream constantly.

Laziness is a good deal like money, the more a man has of it, the more he wants.

An Irish paper tells of a smart wife that helped her husband to raise seventy acres of wheat. The way she helped him was to stand in the door and shake a broom at him when he sat down to rest!

A poor fellow was brought before one of the police-courts of Philadelphia, charged with drunkenness. "Well, why did you get drunk?" "Sir how," was the reply, "why, I met an old friend accost of a drake on man; " what did you give license for?"

A "backward spring" is produced by presenting a dun a short pair of heels.

"Then I'll bring a suit for my bill!" said an enraged tailor to a dandy who refused to pay him. "I'll answer it," was the cool reply, as he turned round, pointing to his threadbare clothes; "that is just what I expect."

A grand jury ignored a bill against a negro charged with stealing a watch. The judge discharged him from custody he called up the prosecutor and told him that he must not let our wrath run nor to appear here again. "Why, Judge," said the man, "I have been here six times only de constable fetch me."

"Now, my dear," said a mother to her daughter, who had been taking a nap before dressing for an evening party, "remember to wake up with a smile. You couldn't make it look any rougher if you tried."

"Boy!" cried out Brown to the waiter at Sam's, "what's the price of that fish?" "Fifty cents, Sir." "Fifty cents!" "Then do as you'd be done by," put in Brown, "and don't set the matter with a question."

A traveler, being at a coffee-house with some gentlemen, was largely drawing on the credulity of the company, when one of them observed that all these wonders happened out of England. "Sir," asked a gentleman, "where were you born?" "In Ireland, Sir," said he, "but somewhere in Europe I suppose." "Europe!" "I should rather think I-o-p-e," "Hessel, I think."

Lovers of tobacco are now designated as "tobacconalians," and the opponents of the weed as "anti-tobacconalians." Is henceforth to be known as "Tobacconalian Science."

"Washington," exclaimed a member of a Nashville debating club, in emotions house—"Washington was a great man; he was a good man; he was a noble man; a great man; he was a good man; he was noble man; a man said was compos mentis, Washington was that man."

"Can't you manage to give my son one of the prizes after the exhibition?" asked a mother of a teacher. "I will see what the reply. "Your son will stand up against the wall, and the boys will throw at him." "Oh, but then," continued the fond mamma, "if that's so you can give him a prize for perseverance."

Stewart, alarmed, caught her in his arms, and endeavored to learn the cause of her sudden outburst of fear. She recovered herself in a moment, and asked, in a tone that still trembled:

"Did you see any one—a man—there—on the foot-path?"

"Yes—a man—certainly, dearest. He went round the corner just now. What of him?"

"Nothing—oh, nothing! Only a wild fancy of mine. Oh, Stewart, if I could believe in ghosts, I should believe that I had seen one now! If the dead could come from their graves to torture the living, I should believe that one dead had come from his grave to torture me."

"Gabrielle, love, whom do you fear? What do you speak of? I will follow the man, and find out who he is."

"No, no, for God's sake! I know it is only a fancy of mine—a foolish, wild fancy. And yet I could not bear to think of your following that man, and you and he looking into each other's eyes. How foolish I am! I am sorry I told you I could tell you all; but I can not now."

They were standing now on the steps of the house in which she lived. He was reluctant to leave her, but she assured him that she was now quite composed, and had almost forgotten her first alarm. Yet there was an ominous sadness in the tone of her voice as she bade him good-night—a clinging, fearful fondness in the pressure of her hand, as if she dreaded to let him go.

Stewart looked out keenly every where as he walked homeward for the man who had alarmed Gabrielle so strangely. He thought he should recognize the figure again, although he had only seen it for a moment. The impression it had made on him was disagreeable; it seemed that figure of a man one would not particularly care to meet suddenly on a dark night if one were unarmed. This was, indeed, only a momentary and vague impression; but Stewart felt convinced he should recognize the man even if he saw him. He saw no one, however, whose form made the same impression on him; and he tried to think nothing of the whole affair.

On one point he felt certain. The man, who ever he was, had reminded Gabrielle of her husband. She had hesitated enough to know that the man had been an utter scoundrel; a libertine, a gambler, a swindler, and worse. He was dead, to be sure; but Gabrielle's life had been so darkened by him that it was little wonder if even a form which reminded her of him could startle her out of all composure.

Stewart went home, and passed at his statue this night with a profound, mournful earnestness he had not felt for a long time. Something, he could not tell what, made him determined to go to bed. He lay upon a sofa in his sitting-room, and at last fell asleep.

He had not slept long when he seemed to hear a wild scream piercing the air and calling his name. He started up, and half persuaded even to think whether the cry was part of a disturbed dream or a very reality, when a hand was laid to his ear, broke horribly upon the silence of the sleeping house; and in the light, faint as it was, that streamed through the shutters from a gas that his cherished statue had fallen from its pedestal, and was smashed into a thousand pieces.

Why was it that he did not pay to lament over the fall of his idol, or even to consider how it had happened? What new terror had made him at once connect its fall with the wild idea of some danger to Gabrielle? He never could tell; but now he seized his hat, rushed down stairs, unlocked the great door, and darted into the street. At full speed he ran through the gray of the morning to Gabrielle's house; and lo! as he came in sight of it, he saw the man of the previous night creep cautiously down the steps, as if he had just crossed the threshold from within.

Stewart sprang at him, and seized him.

"What have you been doing there?" he demanded, fiercely.

"Just spending a quiet hour with my wife, was the reply, delivered with a savage scowl and sneer. "I am Gabrielle Rondelle's husband. She thought me dead, but she was mistaken. Now I am in a hurry to find out whether she dead. You are the Yankee who was to have married her, are you? Sorry to have crossed your love's path, but she is my wife, all the same."

"This is not true," groaned poor Armstrong.

"It's true, for all that. As for you, you will tell me what I want. Have you any thing more to say?"

Stewart turned away without a word, and staggered home like one who is drunk. There, in the dawn now clearing, lay the symbol of his ruined hopes and love destroyed—the broken statue.

When the sun rose and the world awoke he decided that he would go straight to see Mr. Aer, and learn all the truth from her own lips. But before he could leave the house a message was made by a letter for him from her mistress. With trembling hands he opened it and read:

"DEAREST ARMSTRONG,—I am not well to-day; I will not live without you. I did not deceive you, but we would certainly decided. Only one way now is left to me. I escape from a life which henceforward would be too hideous for endurance. Oh, forgive me that I have blighted your life; and when you can lift your head from this sorrow, think of me as I am now.

"Not in life, but at least in death, your own

"GABRIELLE."

Stewart Armstrong rushed like a madman to her house; it was all in commotion—it was too late. The moment she dismissed her maid with the letter Gabrielle flung herself on her bed, and they found her there with a tiny dagger—a pretty toy that used to lie on her dressing-table—driven into her heart. The determined, despairing hand that had driven it home still clung around its hilt.

The husband of the unhappy woman disappeared again into the darkness, and was seen no more. Stewart Armstrong still lives—a hopeless, gloomy man, prematurely old, who wanders about Europe purposeless as a ghost.

GENERAL UHRICH

GENERAL UHRICH, the commander of the defenses of Strasburg, is in his sixty-ninth year, having been born at Phalsbourg in the year 1802.

In 1820 he left the military school of St. Cyr as Sous-Lieutenant in the Third Regiment of Light Infantry, with which he served through the Spanish campaign of 1823, being present at the siege of Pampeluna.

His promotion was not very rapid, for it was not until 1848 that he became Colonel of his old regiment, the Third Infantry. He was General of Brigade, and in 1855 General of Division, in present rank.

His military record is that of a thoroughly brilliant service during the siege of Sebastopol. In 1857 he was nominated Commander of the Legion of Honor, and in 1862 Grand Officer of the same order.

General Uhrich is well known to the people of Strasburg and, at the outset, took a leading part in the province, and held command of the subdivision of the Bas-Rhine for some years.

Since his commencement of the siege General Uhrich has issued very stringent orders respecting Prussian spies who are believed to be inside the fortifications, and to whom short shrift is to be given if detected.

The General has two brothers, one a distinguished officer in the army, the other an Intendant-General. He has also a son and nephews serving on his staff.

From the excellent portrait given on our double page our readers may judge that General Uhrich retains all the vigor and energy of youth, despite his near approach to the Psalmist's threscore and ten.

STRASBOURG.

THIS city, of which we give a view on our double page, is now a fortress of the first-class, but of very irregular shape, being about three miles long by two and a quarter wide, in seven and a half miles in circumference. It is situated on the rivers Ill and Rhine, which flow into the Rhine within a mile of the city, and is surrounded by a bastioned wall, with deep ditches, filled by numerous sluices of water. The wall is pierced by seven gates: those of Blanche and the Governor lead to the suburb of the same to the northeast, Juifs and Pecheurs to the north, and the Dauphin and L'Hopital gates to the south. The Austerlitz and Finkmatt gates are defended by peculiarly strong redoubts. The citadel with its four bastions, which forms the extremity of the city, was constructed by the celebrated engineer VAUBAN.

The canal Ill, entering the city at the south east, forming a grand sluice to the fortifications, by which the whole environs can be inundated, divides within the walls into several smaller streams, which are reunited as they leave the city on the Rhine. The Ill forms a branch of the Ill, called Bruche, which reaches the canal eastern portions of the city, and receives on the right the canal of the Rhine, which joins the Strasbourg a direct communication with that river. Fifty-seven bridges, a number of them branches of the Ill, nine of which are of stone, and arched. Strasbourg, before the commencement of hostilities, contained a population of eighty thousand, who dwelt in generally well-built houses, and the whole appearance of the city corresponds on the banks of the various streams.

The Cathedral has ever been one of the great sights of Europe, its tower being considered the chef-d'œuvre of Gothic architecture. Indeed, Strasbourg is full of ancient buildings—the Chateau Rohan, built by Cardinal DE ROHAN; the Church of St. Thomas, which contains the tomb of Maréchal DE SAXE; the Hotel de Ville, where, in olden days, dwelt the Emperors of Germany; these and many other magnificent specimens of art and skill are now being ruthlessly destroyed by the Prussian bombardment.

GENERAL TROCHU.

SIX weeks ago this able military officer was appointed Governor of Paris and Commander-in-Chief of the troops destined for the defense of the beautiful capital of France, and has now been nominated Military Governor. General Jules TROCHU is fifty-five years of age, and in his youth was a pupil of the military school of St. Cyr and of the school of Metz. He enjoys a very high reputation for military ability, which, however, has never until now been tested by any independent command. He served in Algeria on the staff of Marshal BUGEAUD, and in the Crimea on the staff of Marshal CANROBERT. After the Marshal's death he was promoted to the rank of General of Division. In 1867 TROCHU, which he held until the close of the Russian war. During the Italian campaign of 1859, which was ended by the victory of Solferino, he held the distinction is command of a division. Since that time he has been a member of the Consultative Committee at the Ministry of War, and as the end of 1866 he was specially appointed to consider and report upon the best organization of the French army, in consequence of the aggrandizement of Prussia. The result of his labors was published anonymously a book entitled "The French Army in 1867," which attracted great attention, and of which a second edition was in six months. In it he severely criticised the organization of the French army, and especially the consequences of those changes under the Empire which tended to render the soldiery a separate and professional caste, severed in interest and feeling from their civilian countrymen. He received no appointment in the army, however, and the Empire was not broke out; but it is understood that he was to have commanded the land forces which were to have composed the Baltic Expedition, but which were recalled from Cherbourg and Brest to defend Paris and Metz.

The portrait on our double page is from a photograph by Disdéri of Paris.

PROCLAIMING THE REPUBLIC.

ON Saturday, the 3d of September, the total defeat of M'MAHON and his army was announced to the Corps Législatif. The Count De Palikao, essaying to palliate the terrible disaster, would not be listened to; but JULES FAVRE rose, and he proposed to vest all power in the hands of General TROCHU. No action, however, was then taken; but on the following day, Sunday, the 4th, the populace invaded the legislative halls, shouting "Vive la République!" and in the midst of the greatest disorder and tumult, but unaccompanied by any actual violence, the President put on his hat and declared that the Count De Palikao and other members of the Ministry, Whereupon, finding it impossible to obtain any hearing, broke up the Chambers. M. GARNIER-PAGÈS, accompanied by the members of the Left, proceeded to the steps of the Corps Législatif, and there announced the dethronement of the Emperor to the people assembled outside. Our readers will find, from the sketch of the scene on page 652, that M. GARNIETA found considerable difficulty here also in making himself heard by the immense throng in front of and around him. They then hurried to the Hotel de Ville, and installed themselves as the Provisional Government. Within an hour or two afterward, by the simple display of a few bayonets, possession was secured of the various ministries, the Prefecture of Police, the telegraphs, and the printing-machines of the Journal Officiel; and, presto! the Empire is changed into a Republic. The Parisians have made so many revolutions that they have become perfect masters of the mode of proceeding to a formula, and the overturning of a throne is with them like any well-rehearsed scene in a play.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

WARD BEECHER was rumored that Chevalier Wikoff might cross the Atlantic to sing in the metropolis of America, for the sum of music expected a treat. And now that she has come, and they have heard her wonderful voice, their delight and admiration have been most enthusiastic. Never has any artiste been received with more cordiality and appreciation than this young, beautiful, and gifted Swede. The purity and delicacy of her voice, combined with the transcendent power of its tones, the wonderful capacity she exhibits to interpret every emotion and passion breathed by the music she sings, as well as her graceful beauty and unaffected demeanor, have made her a favorite with all who have had the blessing of Mlle. Nilsson's first appearance in Steinway Hall a storm of Beecher, and fainted for appreciation of the music, and at the close of the performance presented a number of her own countrymen, with the notes of the Swedish national ballad lingering in their ears, awaited her entrance into her carriage, and, substituting themselves for the horses, dragged their favorite to her hotel.

The entertainment which supports Mlle. Nilsson during the present engagement includes several artistes of celebrity, and the concerts have been a rare enjoyment to the musical-loving public.

Strasbourg has long been famous for its pâtés de foie gras, made of the livers of geese, which are enlarged to an unnatural size by the process of shutting the birds up singly in a coop too narrow to allow them to turn, and feeding them with corn soaked in water until it is a paste. The winter is the season for fattening them, the coolness being essential. These coops are very common in Strasbourg. Instances are known of a goose's liver having attained the weight of two or three pounds.

Somewhere in the vicinity of Chicago a "Magnetic Healing Institute" is opened, which is capable of supplying that city with at least 1000 barrels a day, and still leave a great deficiency in bathing purposes. It is the unanimous opinion of all who have tasted this water that it must be highly medicinal.

Paris is deserted by the fashionable world, society is dispersed, and Imperial splendor quitted the once gay city. A lady writing from that city says:

"The daughter of the regular state of feeling would be impossible; it is agitated beyond expression; and yet there is nothing actually to excite it. The shops are open, but nobody enters them to make purchases; the theatres are closed, with no men. As a rule, the ladies of the richer class among our acquaintance have gone to Trouville, Dieppe, Etretat, Fontainebleau, or to their estates in the country. Parisian life, in short, is at present suspended. There are no new books to read, no fashionable soirées, &c., &c., and we are left with mourning toilets, for it is easy to see that we shall not be in full dress for months. In fact, there is scarcely a family that has not personally to lament the loss of at least one relative. In whatever quarter establishment you enter, black surrounds you on all sides."

The following humorous malapropos incident is recorded: It happened the other day that the Crown Prince praised the Bavarian army for its bravery on the battle-field, and soldiers belonging to that corps. "Yes, your Royal Highness," remarked one of them, "we have done our duty in 1866" (meaning the battles they were fighting against Prussia), "we should have done more—and against Prussians."

The Parisians have named a street leading from the Faubourg St. Honore to the Champs Elysées, M'Mahon.

The City Hall Park is at present in a state of fearful confusion. The old gas-pipes are being removed, the sidewalks are torn up, and a passage across it is anything but agreeable. In a few weeks, however, we are promised order out of the confusion. Many improvements are being made which will add greatly to the beauty of this park.

When 40,000 Parisians all at once, as it moved by one motion and universal fear, took the quick resolve to abandon their homes, their fields, and stores to seek shelter behind the fortifications of the city, never, perhaps, in the annals of history, was there a more memorable Sunday did it last without a moment's intermission. Vehicle of every shape, size, and burden —from the heavy furniture-van, with its rumbling, unsteady pace, to the humble hand-cart drawn or wheeled along by the poor mother, whose little stock of household goods was surmounted by the younger children, while the elder ones trudged wearily by her side—crowded the streets to that extent that the omnibuses were compelled to move at a snail's pace among them, the most brilliant carriages were applied, in many cases, to the most menial uses. A whole history was written in that single episode. Many families who had been compelled to hire three and four heavy coaches for the conveyance of their goods were forced to follow them on foot. The rent was so sudden and so tremendous that the most exorbitant prices were offered for the hire of vehicles even of the humblest description.

Famine and pestilence are following in the wake of the great European war. An immense area of country is ravaged, thousands of homes destroyed, herds, and destitute of every thing. On the ground of common humanity an appeal has been made to the American people to send relief to the wounded and suffering.

The College of the City of New York is overflowing with students. We understand that it opened with over eight hundred scholars, while the capacity of the building is not much above seven hundred. Probably the number will be somewhat diminished by the eight weeks' probation. A new building is in the process of construction, which is designed to accommodate the newer classes of the college.

When the imperial apartments of the Tuileries were thrown open after the flight of the Empress, they were traces every where of a most precipitate departure. Empty bottles and glasses were strewn about. In passing through the suit of rooms which had belonged to the Emperor and his son the first object that attracted attention was a child's sword lying on a sofa, half drawn from its scabbard, as if it had been carelessly thrown aside. Amidst torn numbers of the Gaulois, the Opinion Nationale, and the Figaro, lay the helmet of a revolver. In all the rooms the perfumes of flowers could be seen. In the Emperor's drawing-room was the palace diary, with the page relating to the 4th of September half torn away. In the corridors, which are ordinarily kept lighted, the lamps were found to have been carefully extinguished, and to have left behind them a faint odor of oil. In another room, where the remains of breakfast, which evidently been cut short. It was of very simple fare, consisting only of boiled eggs and bread and cheese. A change was done by the mob to the interior of the Tuileries.

A visitor to the American Institute Fair will find, in the department of the humorous and the ingenious, ample and pleasurable occupation for many hours. There he may have a little fun, and there he there may fail to discover any system of classification, so incongruous is the apparent arrangement. The following enumeration may assist in comprehending matters: 1. Art; 2. Comfort and Elegance in Homes; 3. Textile Fabrics; 4. Apparel; 5. Machinery; 6. Intercommunication; 7. Agriculture. The second department contains articles of every kind and description, exceptingmachinery, and will specially interest those who are in search of objects to have, rather than to see. The fair will continue open through October.

The heroic defense of Phalsbourg by its governor is another instance of history repeating itself. In 1814, when Phalsbourg was besieged by the allied armies under the Duke of Wurtemberg, the governor, when he replied, "I will surrender the town when the bowstrings are my pocket-handkerchief on fire."

After the battle of Sedeen the streets about the residence of Bismarck were thronged with enthusiastic people, who vociferated for a speech. After many ineffectual efforts to get rid of the crowd, the Chancellor mounted, and saying to those with him, "If the people will have me for one way they must have me here to walk me—seek a home," he walked to the balcony and began to speak. He was interrupted with a few words of praise to the soldiers who had won Sedeen.

A couple of Western editors thus sum up their wealth: by account "Mr. Editor (my wife), $1,000,000; our five-carat-old editor, $500,000; one seven-weeks-old subscriber, $1,000,000; one tooth of ours, one on account, $1; sensitive, 12 cents; total, $1,750,001 85."

The other has a belief in figures of his own reckoning: "Mrs. Editor, $2,000,000; our six-year-old editor, $1,000,000; our seven-year-old editor, $700,000; one-year-old subscriber, $800,000; one editress one week old, $400,000; cash on hand, 10 cts; due on account, 15 cts; total assets, $4,900,000 25 cts."

It is affirmed that a large part of the personal correspondence of the Imperial family was found in some of the sixty-six trunks of the Empress Eugénie which were arrested. She herself was immediately released, but it was the intention of the authorities to detain the private papers which might have been confided to her safe-keeping.

The absence of Queen Victoria from her capital at such an important time, when the Court is usually extremely commented upon, even by her loyal subjects. It seems that the Queen's journey from London—after a journey of twenty-four hours—and on the signature of the Queen in succession to all documents of state, a telegraphic dispatch connected with the war is delayed three days. The English people do not like this way doing business.

The Salamanca bridegroom who recently gave a forged check to the clergyman who married him would be justly served should he find his bride "worthless."

It is the thoughtful suggestion of a visitor to public hospitals that some cheap pictures would be more beneficial to the sick inmates than the fine ones now hung in the wards. To avoid it would seem to be but it is a great relief to have something pleasant upon which the eye can rest. Flowers, birds, children, and the cheapest decorations of any kind, would be a godsend to many a weary patient.

Notes and Queries gives the origin of the phrase, "He will never set the town on fire." It appears that the steer used in sitting, the flour at a still is so that the steer used in sitting, the flour at a still is so called (in Yorkshire) and it has occasionally happened that combustion has been caused by the hard and continuous friction. From this cause it has sometimes the flour-barrel's fire. The word has been, oddly enough, of unpaid into France from this country we say, "He will never set the river on fire."

THE COURT OF APPEALS.

On this page we give portraits of the Judges of the new Court of Appeals, who were inducted into office on the 1st of July.

The Chief Justice, SANFORD E. CHURCH, first entered public life as a member of Assembly from Orleans County, in 1842, and was the only member of the Democratic party in the House from the Eighth District. He took immediate and prominent rank as a debater, and displayed that prudence and sagacity as a politician which has characterized him since. In 1847 he was elected Comptroller of the State, and served his term of three years. In 1867 he was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention as one of the delegates at large; and at the election in June last was elevated to the Chief Justiceship of the Court of Appeals, having received the largest vote cast for any member of that court. Judge CHURCH has been a member of several of the National Conventions of the Democratic party; and at the National Convention held at Tammany Hall, in 1868, received the vote of the New York delegation for the Presidency.

Mr. Justice WILLIAM F. ALLEN has filled various public positions. In 1843 and 1844 he represented Oswego County in the Assembly. In 1847 he was elected a Justice of the Supreme Court for the Fifth Judicial District, and was re-elected in 1855. In November, 1867, he was elected Comptroller of the State, and was the incumbent of that office at the time of his election to the Court of Appeals.

Mr. Justice RUFUS W. PECKHAM had long held a distinguished position at the bar prior to his election to the Thirty-third Congress from the Albany district. In 1861 he was elected a Justice of the Supreme Court, and re-elected in November, 1867, for eight years.

Mr. Justice MARTIN GROVER was known as an able lawyer and eloquent advocate throughout the Eighth Judicial District prior to his entrance into public life, which was as a member of the Thirtieth Congress, in which he served from 1845 to 1847, where he attained high rank as a debater. In 1857 he was elected a Justice of the Supreme Court from the Eighth Judicial District, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Justice MULLETT; and re-elected, in 1869, for the full term of eight years. As a man of strong and original intellectual force he has scarcely a superior on the bench.

Mr. Justice CHARLES J. FOLGER, after having at a very early age won distinction at the Ontario bar, when JOHN C. SPENCER, MARK H. SIBLEY, FRANCIS GRANGER, ALVAH WORDEN, were at the zenith of their fame, was, in 1844, when but twenty-six years old, appointed First Judge of Ontario County, under the second Constitution; and in November, 1851, was elected to that office. In 1862 he was elected a State Senator from the Twenty-sixth District, and was re-elected in 1864, 1866, and 1868, and resigned for the purpose of accepting the office of Assistant Treasurer of the United States in this city. In the Senate he was the conceded leader of the Republican party—a position to which he was entitled by the soundness of his judgment, his admirable executive ability, and his readiness and power in debate. His personal popularity is sufficiently attested by the fact that his vote for Associate Justice was largely in excess of that of any of the candidates on the Republican ticket.

Mr. Justice CHARLES A. RAPALLO, although a young member of the bar, is, for the first time, the occupant of high official station. He is known as one of the ablest lawyers in the State, and has appeared as leading counsel in several cases involving a larger amount of money than has ever been brought into our higher courts for adjudication.

Mr. Justice CHARLES ANDREWS, of Syracuse, appears also for the first time in a public capacity, with the exception of having been a member of the last Constitutional Convention. In Central New York he has occupied a prominent position at the bar, and socially is held in high esteem.

MR. PEPYS AND HIS WIFE.

ONE of the most humorous—yet one of the saddest—of the records in Mr. Pepys's "Diary" is the history of his wife's jealousy, and the trouble it occasioned him. Never, perhaps, was a picture of the working of that dread passion painted with more perfect skill—never was a demonstration of morbid anatomy more complete; and, as we read it, the whole drama seems itself before our eyes. He was, I believe, really very fond of his young and pretty wife: but I fear that he gave her some reason to suspect, from the natural gallantry of his character, and his devotion to de bons sens, one and all. "I am," he says, "a most loving husband, sir;" but I think, on the whole, Mrs. Pepys paid him off pretty handsomely. She comforted herself at home so warm that toward the end of the "Diary" we find him, after one of these little matrimonial tournaments, going "to bed weeping to himself for grief;" and, a few pages on, he cries out in the anguish of his soul that he "can no longer endure this life."

Nor did his good lady always confine herself to the usual female artillery of snubs and sulks and sighs and tears. Upon one occasion she declined to retire to rest at the usual hour, and he was obliged to leave her sitting up. But, happening to wake about 1 A.M., he found her approaching his side of the bed, "with the tongs red-hot at the ends, as if she did design to punish me with them;" evidently intending to scare him by the nose, as St. Dunstan did his adversary! Upon this Mr. Pepys prudently skipped out of bed, and induced the fair creature to lay down her arms; but I think he must always have felt some little uneasiness afterward when bedtime came. The method in which he carried himself throughout this campaign is admirably described. His mode of warfare seems to have been to soothe her at the time, and, some twenty hours afterward, to pick a quarrel with her about something else, and then rap her well over the knuckles—a mode of procedure which I think I have seen elsewhere. But, altogether, she appears to have pretty much carried her point, and made him feel, if not see, the error of his many offenses, whereupon, when he had been chastised into repentance, and all was smooth, he actually, Mrs. Pepys, as the chief apple of discord, would be evil fortune wink at him in the middle of the play, and as Mrs. Pepys sat watching the internal of the scene his answering smile would be at once detected, and hostilities would recommence with redoubled violence.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

"IN 1858 I bought a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine, which is still in good order, and does as good work as ever, without a cent's worth of repairs. It has averaged two hundred and fifty dollars a year, besides family sewing. With the needle I planned over three thousand yards of magic ruffling. Tucking and hemming are my favorite pastime. I never sit at the machine alone without saying, 'God bless Wheeler & Wilson,' and it is still my prayer."—MARY A. STEWART, Upper Alton, Ill.

PEARLS AND RUBIES.

WHEN rosy lips part pearls should glitter behind them. To preserve and beautify the dental enamel there is no preparation like Sozodont, a compound of the most wholesome vegetable antiseptics, obtained in the Bark of the South American Soap-Tree, known to the natives as Quillaya, and used by the Spanish Americans for cleansing, without impairing, the most delicate fabrics, is the most important.

"SPALDING'S GLUE" will just suit you.—[Com.]

INTERESTING TO LADIES.

"WE have used the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine in the House of the Friendless for many years. It has done excellent service, and has been an invaluable assistant in the Making and repairing of the hundreds of garments here, and remains a monument of excellent work done."—MRS. I. GRANT, Matron of the Home of the Friendless, Chicago.

MARRIAGE BELLS.

With wide, warm wings the lonely autumn day
Sails mounts and broods,
Still slowly soars from heaven to heaven away
In airy solitudes,

While fitfully from sun-soaked balsam woods
The light wind wells,
Gay with the silver chords and interludes
Of chiming marriage bells.

Oh, happy pods, within whose musie dwells
The magic rune
That sets to sweet accords and joyous swells
Two lives in perfect tune!

Oh, happy heralds to the silent noon,
To whom tis given
To ring upon the melancholy swoon
Tidings of open heaven!

THE PRESENT DUTY OF REPUBLICANS.

THE Democratic Convention of New York declined to say whether the party acquiesces in the great settlements of the war—the reconstruction acts and the constitutional amendments. But evasion is itself declination. When the public mind is interested in a certain question upon which one party occupies the firmest and almost unequivocal position, the refusal of the other to express its agreement is to say that it does not agree. And the party is more evident when its convention feels that the question can not be altogether avoided, and therefore chooses words purposely intended to define its action. No intelligent man can doubt that if the two parties should ask the support of this State and of the country upon the single point of the honorable maintenance of the conditions upon which the Union has been restored and of the pledged public faith, the party which unfeignedly supported the amendments and the national honor would be decisively sustained. And this is really one of the most conspicuous elements of the present situation. The Republican party would go steadily forward building up its future upon the foundations already laid. The Democratic party would not hesitate to disturb them, and takes care not to say any thing inconsistent with that policy.

The evidence of this position of the Democratic party is of various kinds, but it is conclusive. Thus the Governor elect of South Carolina, in his letter which announces his separation from the Democratic party, says: "If good and honest men would accept in the reconstruction acts of Congress and the legislation, Federal and State, necessarily growing out of them," there might be a very rapid restoration of prosperity. This means that there is a general refusal to acquiesce in the finality of reconstruction, and that the good and honest men who will accept it are, in Governor ORR's opinion, certainly not to be found in the Democratic party, or he would not leave it. The Democratic Senator THURMAN, of Ohio, has recently made a speech in which he substantially reasserts the old doctrine of State rights, condemns the whole system of reconstruction, and declares that the new constitutional amendments are—not adopted—but "declared to be adopted." The point of his speech is, that the entire Republican rule has been a usurpation, and implies, of course, that as much of the constitutional action as may be found necessary for Democratic purposes will be set aside when the Democrats return to power.

In harmony with this strain was the speech of Mr. TILDEN, the Chairman of the Democratic State Committee of New York, at the party Convention. After a courteous allusion to the intelligence and high character of many members of the Republican party, he said that the crowning evil of the party was its policy of centralism, leading to imperialism, a policy destructive of liberty and of popular government. The proof of this he found in the reconstruction measures of that party—measures, which, of course, he says, are to free the country from imperialism and to save the government, must be reconsidered, and which, if the Democratic party comes into the same opinion as in 1868, must be pronounced unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void, and set aside. The spirit of the Democratic party is still further shown in the fact that, with few exceptions, the Democratic newspapers which demand that the party shall acquiesce in the amendments and the whole system of reconstruction have no weight whatever in the party councils, and all of them together are an insignificant number.

The issue upon this vital point is plain. Every vote for Democratic success is a vote for reopening the terrific agitation from which the country hoped it was peacefully emerging. Are the great interests of this State and of the country desirous of such a convulsion? With all the faults of detail that may be charged upon the measures of reconstruction, have they not, upon the whole, resulted happily for the country, and is there not a general tranquillity and prosperity which, had they been foretold six years ago, would have seemed the mere dream of enthusiasm? Do the intelligent people really believe that the administration of a party which has established equal rights tends to a fatal imperialism; or that the ascendency of a party which for a generation was devoted solely to the extension and perpetuity of slavery is the most promising guarantee of liberty?

The Republican party is composed of the most enlightened and independent citizens. It criticises freely its own officers, and the measures of its own Administration. It often seems, therefore, to those who judge of the cohesion of parties by the aspect produced by the ignominious Democratic drill, that the Republican party is trifling to pieces because it is agitated. But when the appeal to the country has been made upon grave and fundamental issues, every honest American knows the differences of detail between Republicans, or their debates upon the future policy of the party, are forgotten in the harmonious resolution to maintain what they have already gained. The action of the Democratic party proves that the necessity of such a position is still imperative upon Republicans, and those who do not see it inevitably, however honestly, imperil the highest interests of the country.

MISSOURI.

IT is from the considerations just stated that we differ from our friends in Missouri, who think that the Democratic party may properly be endangered upon the issue of what is called revenue reform. But we repeat what we said the week ago, that liberty politics demands the gravest consideration. It is t.t enough to call them traitors. The Tribune takes exception to the epithet, and says that we advise the majority to surrender to the minority. Yes the very words which it quotes showed that we said nothing of the kind. What we said, and say, is this: that both the majority and minority of the Republican party should be equally loyal to each, and, if they differ upon any issue which is immediate and fundamental, some common understanding must be at least sought. If one party does not agree to differ upon a pressing fundamental issue, and if revenue reform be considered such, we are unable to see how the majority or the minority of the party, we are unable to see that kicking and cuffing are likely to be of any use.

Now, if the Democratic party in Missouri and the prohibitionists in Massachusetts think that it is better the Democrats should obtain power than the Republicans should hold it, if they will not advocate what is called revenue reform, if they will not support this great reform and prohibition, we differ from them profoundly. But we think that men not agree to differ upon a pressing fundamental issue; for the Convention but for the country, it is worth while to inquire upon what grounds this assertion of a dangerously centralizing tendency in the government is made. Mr. TILDEN speaks of the origin of the Union. What are the facts? The theory of State sovereignty, which had made the old confederation a rope of sand, and had exposed our national liberty and independence to mortal peril, almost succeeded in baffling the efforts of the wisest and most patriotic of our fathers to secure a truly national union. A few years after it was established ALEXANDER HAMILTON said to JONATHAN QUINCY that the centripetal force of the Union, which is essential to realizing tendency, was so slight that the Union would not probably last more than a generation, and always he put small reliance in the doctrine of the sovereignty of the States.

This doctrine was the substance of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798, so veiled as to be of the most elusive meaning, reaching even to the right of secession. Those resolutions were the virtual platform of the Democratic sufferers of JACKSON'S day, and of the Democratic secessionists of BUCHANAN'S. The doctrine of State sovereignty was the reliance of slavery, and the justification of rebellion. The deadliest domestic enemies of the Union alive proclaimed this doctrine as the national government which is the basis of Mr. TILDEN'S speech. The country has seen the consequences, and it feels that when the attack upon the national authority was formerly made under the plea of the reserved rights of the States. The same attack is now made under the cry of centralization. The result in both cases is the same. It is the weakening of the bond which has been approved and consecrated to the national existence and prosperity.

The cry is raised at this time because, in restoring the Union, which had been overthrown by the attempt to destroy the government, under the pretense that it was no government, but an agency at the will of sixteen States, the powers of the United States have determined the conditions upon which the disaffected States might be recognized. They have, in effect, decided that certain fundamental conditions are essential in every State to the national security, and those, under the Republican ascendancy, will be provided. But the Republican party is founded upon liberty. It includes the intelligent population, who, more than any other, understand the necessary conditions of freedom. Therefore these provisions do not transcend the limits which a genuine desirable local control from necessary national co-operation. Maine does not undertake to manage legislation in Georgia; but the United States may secure to the vital conditions of republican government shall be respected by both those States.

In what degree manner to possess either liberty or to local legislation the national government is felt in the State of New York, for instance, Mr. TILDEN omits to mention. He confines himself to the general assertion that State rights have been absorbed. We trust, indeed, that the asserted rights of any State have not been absorbed just so far as they interfered with the united rights of all the States. This it was the imperative duty of the people to do, and it was emphasized by the rebellion. Centralization, in the sense of imperialism, as described by Mr. TILDEN, does not threaten the Union as, but it is impossible. His speech, however well meant, is merely a continuation of the old cry that furnished a pretense to the rebellion. The safety of American republican institutions is in the general intelligence of the people. That will promote a wise and oppose a perverse administration; and whether that intelligence tends to the Republican or Democratic parties no one knows better than Mr. TILDEN.

THE CRIMINAL AT WILHELMSHOHE.

By universal consent the present war in Europe is the work of one man, LOUIS NAPOLEON, PRUSSIA, by every honorable means, sought to avoid it, but LOUIS NAPOLEON pressed on. It is due to him that every dire suffering of war has fallen upon hundreds of thousands of peaceful homes and tender hearts, and that a devastation and ruin which are inconceivable overspread Europe. The sorrow which has been occasioned can only be surmised now and then from some tragical story of individual ruin which is all the papers. All the criminals of France since he built his empire upon perjury have done nothing which can compare in enormity with the deed of his election to the throne. But this man, whose crimes are unrelieved by any personal heroism or dignity, and who betrays his country to strengthen his brigands and shame, now lives in a romantic and spacious palace with the subdued state of majesty in misfortune.

It is one of the cruel contrasts of the war that many a brave and noble and devoted soldier, who has left the delights of home and sacrificed all that is most alluring in life and hope to perish by the fault of this wretched man, falls stricken and died, knowing that he leaves his family to every form of calamity, while the author of the tragedy pays no penalty, and is safe from harm. They who think that NAPOLEON BONAPARTE was hardly treated when he was exiled to St. Helena will perhaps reconsider their judgment when they are reminded by the conduct of the nephew how vast the crimes of the elder NAPOLEON were.

It is a false and perilous philosophy which forgets the man in the emperor, and which does not see that the personal moral responsibility of LOUIS NAPOLEON could never be set aside. He knew what war was. It is the last and terrible appeal, unless which must be used as other resource fails. But he made no effort to avoid it. On the contrary, he took care that it should not be avoided. And when by this he deliberately, consciously, intentionally decreed the slaughter of thousands of innocent men, and of a time when the sound of a window into a crowd is held guilty of murder should any one be killed, how much guilt, nor should the destruction of cities, war-fraught peace, and made the anguish of a country lost!

THE DEMOCRATS AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

THE Democratic School Board of Louisville, Kentucky, recently directed that Appleton's "Southern School History of the United States," written by the principal of the Louisville High School, an ex-officer in the rebel army, and published by an ex-rebel firm in Baltimore, should be substituted, as a text-book in the schools, for McGUFFEY'S "Revised Historical History of the United States," which had been decried as a "radical" work. The character and spirit of this school-book, which, before Democratic appointment, the children of Louisville are to learn the history of their country, may be inferred from the following extract from the chapter speaking of the massacre of the Union soldiers in Baltimore, and of what followed, says:

"The defense of the Southern cause found ardent resentment in the North. The streets were posted with placards, calling for troops to 'subdue the ungrateness upon Baltimore.' The noblest and meanest passions of the human heart were appealed to, for the purpose of obtaining volunteers. 'Shall the Capital be left in danger?' 'The government is upon the verge of ruin!' 'Let patriots stand by their country in the hour of need!' At the same time influential journals declared that the Baltimore massacre, together with the men were cowards and bullies, and the women unsexed, and without pity. Study and Beauty was one of the watch-words of the hour."

Here we have the wretched falsehood of BRADFORD and BARNARD transferred to a school history, and serving the same purpose for which it was originally uttered, namely, to inflame civil hatred. And as it is the purpose to sympathy with rebellion is as timid as it is positive, it is alleged, when objection is made, that this history is not in the schools only as far as the account of the late war!

The consequences of the action of the school are to book and not one exclusive. They are placed in the hands of children at the most ductile and unsuspicious age, and their entire feeling toward the government of their country is perverted by them. The sorry subterfuge of saying that a certain part of the book is not taught is merely evasion. It is left to the discretion of the schools by Democratic direction as the history of the country, and the child reads that the rising of the people to put down the government was stimulated by the basest appeals to the worst of passions. The direct and necessary result is to implant a hatred of the government, and to foster the spirit from which the rebellion sprang. It is another indication of the essentially and radically disorganizing tendency of the Democratic party. It can not forgive the victory of the Union and of liberty. It will not accept the decision, and acquiesce in the conditions which are indispensable to the repose of the country.

Meanwhile the spirit which writes and the party which adopts such a history as this calls itself the conciliatory spirit and the conservative party. In every fresh fact shows that it conciliates nothing but disaffection, and preserves only a malignant jealousy of fidelity to the Constitution. The conciliation and conservation in national affairs are exactly as evident as its honesty and economy in the municipal management of New York.

NOTES.

WHAT is a "Congressman?" We often read in the papers that Congressman Binks is renominated by the Democrats, or that Congressman Jinks are painfully uncertain. Now Congress consists of a hall and broken room in which no men are representatives. A Senator is therefore as much a Congressman as a Representative; and the word Congressman is certainly neither descriptive nor even convenient than Representative.

It is very difficult to determine exactly what is true in the reports which come in clouds every morning from Europe. We saw a letter in a newspaper, the other day, in which the writer said, under date of September 14, that his conjecture had become a certainty, and that the Germans would recognize no other government in France but that of LOUIS JOSEPH EDGAR. He added that COUNT BISMARCK'S organ in Berlin confirmed it. But on the same day, and immediately above the letter, a telegram from Berlin, dated September 27, said that the official journal states to-day that "whatever may be the German plans about France, the restoration of the BONAPARTES is not among them."

THE Tribune very truly remarks that the only conclusion way to reach political managers to nominate good candidates is to scratch the bad. A vigorous exercise of the inalienable right of scratching will tend to purify politics rapidly. The managers count upon the general unwillingness to endanger the success of the party, and often nominate the unworthiest candidates. This is a business which must be resisted at the beginning; and if the people intend to control their own Government, they will carefully watch, right at the proper occasion, lest the managers propose names which do not deserve scratching. It is those who refuse to vote for unfit candidates, but those who nominate them, who are responsible for the pig-dog defeat.

THE occupation of Rome by the troops of the King of Italy does not exclude the Pope altogether from territorial power. But it greatly diminished, but not wholly destroyed. Instead of a part of Italy, he now governs a part of the city of Rome, the Leonine City, as it is called, of the Vatican and its vicinity. When the capitulation was signed the General of the Italian troops stipulated for their withdrawal, assuring the Italian General CADORNA that a guard of two hundred, which he should leave, would be an ample protection for the Pope. CADORNA asked him if he knew the state, and he replied, "Exactly." But when the Italian army entered the city the Italian soldiers found that the fire in the Vatican, and hissed and groaned so menacingly that the Pope was alarmed, and he sought the protection of the Italians. The General complied at first but his interference would vitiate the capitulation upon the receipt of a despatching note from the Pope, he asked instructions from his Government, and he was told to take care of the Pope. On the following day the Pope now under the protection of the king whom he wished to excommunicate. For the sake of the Pope's reputation it is to be hoped that the Romane City will not be abandoned to his temporal government, and that, being the worst in the city, does not inspire respect for the Pope in his ecclesiastical character. It would be curious if the old saying, that the Pope who reigns the twenty-five years will be the last Pope, should be fulfilled in him. He is now in his twenty-fifth year.

THE FARRAGUT OBSEQUIES.

THE final honors paid to the remains of the late Admiral FARRAGUT, on the 30th ult., were of the most impressive character. Nothing of the kind was ever witnessed in New York, with the exception of the funeral of President LINCOLN. The pall of the silvering on the sidewalks was crowded with people who braved the drenching storm to see the solemn procession pass. Had the weather been more propitious, at least half a million of people would have filled the streets to witness its pass. The last tribute of public respect to the most distinguished naval officer of modern times, and the remains, followed by the civil authorities and many distinguished persons, detachments from the army and navy, and the First and Second divisions of the National Guard, etc., were conveyed through Broadway, Fifth Avenue, and Forty-second street to the Harlem depôt, from which they were taken by a special train to Woodlawn Cemetery. At the grave the religious ceremonies were performed by Rev. Dr. MCCOSKRY. The usual salute was fired, and the hero was left to his last rest. In the city business was generally suspended after eleven o'clock, and many of the buildings along the route of the procession were decorated with appropriate inscriptions and emblems of mourning.

The sketch on our first page represents the funeral procession passing up Broadway.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE SITUATION IN FRANCE.

On Friday, September 30, the French made a determined effort to break through the Prussian cordon in force, for the purpose of discovering the position and intentions of the troops. The main attack was directed against the Prussian forces on the heights of Chatillon, at the southern end of the entrenching from St. Cloud attacked in the direction of Versailles. Affairs were reported to be in a very critical state. It was suffered on both sides, the French retired under the guns of the forts.

It is reported from Tours that the Prussians are now preparing for the investment of Paris from the west, where only a single fort—Mont Valerien—defends access. Large bodies of troops are also observed approaching from which converge upon these passages.

The city of Strasburg, which has been in close resistance since the middle of August, surrendered September 27. The garrison consisted of 481 officers and 17,000 men. There was great rejoicing throughout Germany over the news of this event. It is said that no fortress in Europe has been battered by the bombardment, has not been materially injured, and architects have declared that Strasburg is now more impregnable than. After the surrender the Prussian General Werder made a triumphal entry into the city. He announced that the Prussian fire was characterized by extreme mercy, and that only the military establishments in the city had been destroyed. Private property had either been destroyed outright, along with the military buildings, or plundered irreparably ruined. The devastation consequently is terrible. Entire streets are in ashes. Houses have been left with the doorways encumbered with debris and abandoned household furniture, and an utter picture of desolation presented every where. The ruins of the public buildings stand black and desolate, surrounded by piles of rubbish. The celebrated picture-gallery, with nearly all its treasures of art, is entirely destroyed.

On the 27th ult. the French made another sortie from Paris, but were driven back. They, however, recaptured the village of Bondy, and a number of prisoners captured by them in the fight.

The Government has sent a balloon journey from Paris comes by the Atlantic cable. It appears that M. GAMBETTA left the French capital in a balloon on September 30, in a balloon, with a cargo of letters and important official despatches, and reached Tours in safety after a short "voyage." He reports that the Prussians were to be seen near Paris, nor any people on the roads leading to the city, nor boats of any kind on the river. A complete silence reigned about the city. Approaching Versailles, large numbers of Prussian troops were observed in camp. The aeronaut dropped a large number of copies of the recent Government proclamation, which fell in Germans, among whom, and was received by a dozy fire. No harm was done by this, however, as the Germans were out of the Prussian lines, about four miles in the direction of Saint-et-Loire, many miles west of the Prussian lines; and the letters which he had with him, 20,000 in number, to the town post-office, from which they were forwarded to Paris by a special train for the Government dispatches. Relative to matters within Paris, M. GAMBETTA says that the people are armed and determined to defend the walls; and the firing from the forts has shown the enemy that the Parisians are not idle in their attempts to erect batteries. The city is tranquil. Nearly all the inhabitants sleep during the day as usual, the theatres are crowded in the night, and a careful watch kept throughout the whole twenty-four hours. Provisions appear to be abundant, drilling and exercising. No luxuries are to be had; no butter nor fruit. Fresh meats with soon be scarce, but there is a six-months' supply of salted provisions and flour.

The Madrid correspondent of the New York Times writes that the Spanish Government is averse to the Roman Catholic Ecumenical Council, which is to assemble in that city. The plan of Count BISMARCK is to assemble in that city. The plan of Count BISMARCK is to secure the Spanish throne for the Duke of Genoa, when he is to abdicate in favor of his son; that a regency, with the Empress as Regent, is to be established in Paris, a Bonaparte Government associated with her in the Council, is then to be established and endured by Austrian bayonets and a military occupation.

The same correspondent asserts that negotiations are in progress for placing a Bourbon or Prussian prince on the throne of Spain, Prussia furnishing money, and Austria furnishing a part of Algeria, Gibraltar and its annexing Portugal, in order to make her a powerful maritime nation.

A letter in the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung of September 19 contains a protest from a number of the Roman Catholic clergy in the Papal army at Rome against the surrender. They say they were entitled to be heard before the capitulation was signed, and that the King was kept in ignorance of it.

M. HAVAS's recording electric light illuminates Lucerne at night, and the entrance is barred by enormous chains.

On the 26th ult. General CHANZY made an abortive attempt to break the investment in Laval, but was repulsed, with his subcontests, by the Garden Nationales of the Seine.

The London correspondent of the Times of Sunday contains a dispatch dated by the Prince of Wales on the 24th ultimo, which resulted in the capture of the Prince of Neseny, and the wounding of several of the Prussian staff, and the killing of several of the King and his staff started from Homme to Chalons, accompanied by the Duke of Coburg. The royal party were in eight cars, carriages, and were escorted by a regimental cuirassiers. A Bavarian Regiment of Cavalry met the royal cavalcade at a hill through a deep cut which is only wide enough to admit the passage of the carriages in single file. There was a sudden attack from a strong force of Zouaves, who fired a murderous volley at the head of the carriages. The carriages were riddled with repeated volleys, and the horses of the royal carriages were completely cut down. The firing continued, the cavalry which had been in advance, came back, and, seeing the royal carriages, they began making a charge. An investigation it was found that every person in the third carriage, including the Duke of Coburg and his aides, had been either killed outright or mortally wounded. The fifth carriage, in which the King and his staff had been terribly riddled, but none of its occupants had been injured. The body of the King was sent back to Mandelon under a large escort.

GENERAL FOREIGN ITEMS.

On Sunday, October 2, the people of Rome voted on the question of Italian unity. The plebiscitum was carried in the affirmative by a vote of 133,681 to 1,507. Rome has almost unanimously declared in favor of unity with Italy under Victor Emanuel and his successors.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

One of the most destructive freshets ever known in this country occurred in Virginia the last week of September. The rainfall was heavy, and the rivers rose with great rapidity. The James River rose over twenty feet, and the Kanawha over thirty feet. The bridges were swept away, the losses at and near Lynchburg alone amounting to $1,000,000.

The public debt was decreased during the month of September $21,000,000. It was $2,478,126,220 52 at the 1st of March is $21,475,084 89, and since the 1st of October, 1869, is $121,581,415.

A QUEER RECEPTION.

MOLSHEIM, one of the French towns invaded by the Prussians, is situated on the Lower Rhine. Our illustration on page 661 represents the queer reception which the invaders met at this place. An artist, who witnessed this humorous scene, thus alludes to it in his diary:

"You will find the impromptu soaer in most towns and villages of Alsace, but nowhere to such an extent as in Molsheim. I looked down through my Venetian blinds, and found a broad square full of them. In the middle was a fountain, where one or two Baden troopers were watering their horses. To the right stood the Hôtel de Ville, a very ancient building, with high-pitched roof and beautiful tiles, fantastic gable-ends, over the doorway a painted chapelle, under that a clock, and under the clock a bell, struck by queer little puppet figures. Not a soul was about. The geese cackled hideously, as if, like the guardians of the Capitol, to warn the inhabitants of the invasion of the enemy."

THE SURRENDER OF SEDAN.

OUR illustrations on this page give a graphic representation of one of the most novel and picturesque phases of the war in France. One represents the surrender of Sedan. Our engraving shows the French General LAUBRETON holding a flag of truce, and attended by a trumpeter, who sounds a note of parley, standing upon the gate of the fortified town, to invite an armistice, for the purpose of capitulation. This took place at half past four in the afternoon of September 1; and the Prussian artillery fire, which had completely overpowered the French, was stopped before five o'clock, by order of the King, who stood upon the hill of Chevenge, three miles from the gate of the town. The memorable interview between Count BISMARCK and the Emperor NAPOLEON was at seven o'clock the next morning, outside the village of Donchery. They stopped at the cottage of a hand-loom weaver, and sat at the door, engaged in earnest conversation, while the officers in attendance on the Emperor kept their distance by the roadside.

The other illustration on this page, "The Demand to Surrender," almost brings before us a picture of medieval times. It represents a walled French town, like Toul, or Metz, or Strasbourg, before which stand the messengers of the Prussian general in command of the besieging army. The wall is surrounded by a moat, which, owing to the point of view taken by the artist, is only visible in the distance on the left. How vividly does this picture recall to our minds the first scene in the second act of "King John," before the walls of Angiers. We can almost hear those trumpeters calling forth, like King Philip in that scene:

"Then, tell us, shall your city call us lord,
In that behalf which we have challenged it?
Or shall we give the signal to our rage,
And stalk in blood to our possession?"

And how aptly might King WILLIAM, in relation to this whole conflict, say with King JOHN, in the same scene:

"Peace be to France: if France in peace permit
Our just and lineal entrance to our own!
If not, bleed France, and peace ascend to heaven!
Whiles we, God's wrathful agent, do correct
Their proud contempt that beat his peace to heaven."

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE LETTER LOCK.

On the day that Richard left Gothin, which was itself an incident to keep the tongues of its gossips wagging for a good week, another occurrence took place in that favored neighborhood, and one of even more absorbing interest—the workings of Dunloppel were suspended. This, of course, was not a wholly unexpected catastrophe. The new vein, after giving an exceedingly rich yield for some months, had of late, it was whispered, evinced signs of exhaustion, although the fact was not known that for several weeks the undertaking had been carried on at a loss. Neither Trevethick nor Solomon, who were the principal proprietors, was the sort of man to play long at a losing game, or to send good money after bad; so, for the present, the pit was closed. But Solomon believed in Dunloppel; contrary to his custom, he had not disposed of a single share when the mine was at a premium, and his stake in it was very large.

Only a few minutes after Richard had departed for Plymouth with his chest, Solomon returned to the inn with thoughtful brow.

Trevethick was moodily smoking his pipe in the porch, still balancing the rival claims of his son-in-law elect, and dissatisfied with both of them. He did not share Solomon's hopes, and he detested losing his money above every thing. "Well, you've packed off all those fellows, I hope, that have been eating me out of house and home for these three weeks?"

"I've closed the mine, if that's what you mean," said Solomon. "But" (he looked cautiously up at the windows of the inn, which were all open—the guests were out in search of the picturesque, and Harry was on the tower, straining her eyes after Richard) "I want to have a word with you in private, Trevethick."

"Come into the bar parlor, then," grunted the landlord, for he did not much relish the idea of a confidential talk with Solomon just then, since it might have relation to a matter about which he had not fully made up his mind to give him an answer.

"Is that young painter fellow out of the way, then?" asked Solomon. "We have never had a place to ourselves, it seems to me, since he came to Gothin."

"Yes, yes, he's far enough off," answered Trevethick, more peevishly than before, for Sol's remark seemed to foreshadow the very subject he would fain have avoided talking about. "He's gone to Plymouth, he is, and won't be back these five days."

"Umph!" said Sol. If he had said, "I wish he would never come back at all," he could not have expressed his feelings more clearly.

"Well," growled Trevethick, when they were in his sanctum, and had shut the door, "what is it now? Bad news, of course, of some sort."

It was a habit with Trevethick, as it is with many men of his stamp, to have a perpetual grievance against Providence—to profess themselves as never astonished at any bad turn that It may do them—and, besides, he was on the present occasion desirous of taking up a position of discontent beforehand, so that the expected topic might not appear to have produced it.

"No; it's good news, Trevethick," said Solomon, quietly—"the best of news, as it seems to me; and I hope to bring you over to the same opinion."

"He's got some scheme for marrying Harry out of hand," thought the harassed landlord. "How the deuce shall I put him off?"

There was not the slightest excuse to doing so; if Solomon had been of a less phlegmatic disposition, he might have married her a year ago, young as she was. "Read this," said he, producing a letter from his pocket, "and tell me what you think of it. It's old Stratam's report upon the mine."

"Ay, ay," said Trevethick, diving into his capacious pocket for his silver spectacles. As a general rule, he was wont to receive all such reports with discredit, and to throw cold water upon Sol's more sanguine views; but it was several minutes before he could get himself into his normal state of dissatisfied dejection, so much relieved was he to find that his daughter was not to be the topic of the conversation.

"Here's the plan," continued Solomon, "which accompanied the letter. I got it just after I dismissed the men; and, upon my life, I'd half a mind to set them on again. But I thought I'd just have a talk with you first.'

"'Ay,' said Trevethick—"well?" He was quite himself again now—crafty, prudent, reticent; about as unpromising a gentleman to "get on with," far less get the better of in a bargain, as a Greek Jew. But Solomon was quite accustomed to him.

"Strange feels confident about the continuation of the lode, you see; and also that the fault is not immediate. 'We shall not have to sink fifty feet, he thinks, before we come on the vein again.'

"He thinks," said Trevethick, contemptuously.

"Is he ready to sink his own money in it?"

"It's to prove as nothing his lad," answered Solomon coolly, "because he's got none. But I have always found Strauss pretty correct in his judgment; and, as for me, I believe in handspeed. The question is, Shall I go on with it single-handed, or will you go shares?"

"If it's so good a thing, why not keep it yourself, Sol?"

"Because my money is particularly well laid out at present, and I don't want to shift it."

"That's not the case with mine," said Trevethick, from behind the plan.

"I thought you might have five hundred pounds or so lying idle, that's all," returned the other. "I'd give six per cent. for it just now."

"Oh, that's another thing. Perhaps I may. I'll see about it."

"If you could get it me at once, that would be better still," urged Solomon. "There are some good men at the mine whom I should not like to lose. If I could send round to-night to tell them not to engage themselves elsewhere, since they're opening so many new pits just now, that would be a relief to my mind."

"Very good; you may do that, then. I'll write for the money to-morrow."

So then, straightforward, and exceedingly unpleasant a man as John Trevethick was, ought to have been the very incarnation of virtue, whereas that last observation of his was, to say the least of it, Jesuitical. There was no occasion to write to any body for what he had got above stairs, locked up in his private strong-box. But he did not do all the world as he would another even his alter ego, Solomon Cox.

Trevethick, although a clear-headed fellow, was no miser in the common sense. He kept this vast sum at hand, partly because he had no confidence in any investment of it at present, and a stick, so that the breeze might blow upon her tear-stained cheek. How white and worn and emptied of all joy it looked! As he gazed upon her, a touch of pity stole into her father's face. He poured out a little spirits in a glass, and put it to her lips. "Take a sup of this, and you'll be better, child."

She opened her heavy eyes, and shook her head.

"You said you would have mercy, father, if I promised."

"Yes, yes: all shall be forgotten. We will not even speak of it to one another."

"And you will pardon him? You will not hurt my Richard?"

"Your Richard!"

"Yes, for he was mine once. You will not bear witness against him before the judge? Is he not punished enough in losing me? Am I not punished?"

"Silence!" exclaimed the old man, in a terrible voice. His hand, trembling with passion, had struck against the strong-box, and at its touch his wrath broke out in flame. "That man is dead to you henceforth! You gave your promise without conditions. Moreover, his fate is in the hands of the law, and not in mine."

TWO HARVESTS.

THROUGHOUT its length and breadth, from shore to shore,
The golden harvest-fields of our blest land
Have yielded up their increase, and the store
Strown by the great Creator's open hand
Is garnered; so our prayer for daily bread
Is by our Father heard, and answered.

But France! Oh! weep for France! In place of grain
Behold the bloody harvest that she yields!
Instead of shining sheaves, she heaps the slain,
Scattered by tens of thousands on her fields!
Her and Germania's best and bravest
Brothers in death—beneath the peaceful sky!

And where, when falls the mellow autumn day,
Homeward should creak the overloaded wains,
Piled high with goodly wheat, there roll away
The wagon-loads of wounded o'er the plains!
And where her grapes are ripening in the sun,
More purple still—behold her life-blood run!

Oh, sister France! And thou, brave Fatherland,
Hear, hear the prayer we send from this far shore;
Oh, sheath the sword, and stay the ugliest hand
Ere yet another death-cry rends the air!
Surely thy harvest now is finished!
God help thy children when they cry for bread!

THE TOURISTS AT GRAVELOTTE.

ORDERED HOME.

THE armed truce, which is the accustomed counterfeit of peace in Europe, is ever full of shadows, and one of these seemed to fall between the latticed windows of the little Swiss inn on the mountain-side, as the three friends sat down to breakfast, in spite of the straggling sunray that made a prism of the mist from the coffeeurn.

"Ulric, my good fellow," said Conway, "what news have you this morning? You are as glum as a Scotch fog."

"I have news that you English are always safe from; my summer wanderer is ent itled enough. De Senlis, my dear friend, I must give up my promised visit to your château as Gravelotte. I am ordered home."

"And so am I," replied the French count, "though my leave of absence is not yet half expired. The Spanish business threatens trouble, it seems, and I must be with my cuirassiers."

These seemed to be already a something of forced and studied coldness in the manner of the hitherto polite and genial tourist.

"But you, Ulric," said Conway, "you are not in the army?"

"All Prussians are soldiers; and I am a captain of Uhlans in the first ban of the Landwehr. Unless this matter is promptly settled I shall kill no cartridges with you next September."

"I certainly hope that you will not be practicing at French uniforms instead," replied the Englishman. "How soon have you to start?"

"At once, or I shall run the risk of being late, and that would be a serious business for my poor soul I hope there will be no fighting, but if there is, Ulric von Hippel must be in his place."

"And so must Raoul de Senlis," growled the Frenchman, rising from the hardly tasted breakfast. "If there is war, which I shall sincerely regret, the cry of all France will be, 'à Berlin!' —we have been there before."

The blue eyes of the German shone with an unpleasant light, but he replied, without rising,

"The German sword can keep the scabbard even if no Blücher comes to bid us 'forward,'"

The Englishman sprang to his feet.

"De Senlis—Von Hippel—my dear fellows, I won't have a word of this nonsense. We can not meet at Gravelotte, and you two may not come to help murder my partridges, but the war, if there is to be one, shall not begin here. Shake hands now, and part like good friends, and like good soldiers as well. Which of you, if the other was wounded or a prisoner, would not run to help or to him?"

Somewhat rough in his way was Conway, with his huge proportions and his yellow whiskers, and he was actually blushing at his own impetuosity; but he had struck the right chord, and the two fellow-tourists extended their hands with a marked cordiality that had something of shame in it.

"Von Hippel, my dear friend, pardon! Some happier day we will meet at Gravelotte. Remember me most kindly to your family, and especially to the Fräulein, your sister. War does not last forever."

"My dear De Senlis, I hope there will be no war; and if there is, the day may nevertheless come when we shall meet at Gravelotte, as good friends as ever."

"Even the King and the Emperor would promise as much as that," half jocosely observed the Englishman. "But," he added, "it will be a fearful pity to have such an one you cutting each other's throats to keep the diplomats from making a bad Spaniard out of a very good Dutchman. I hope they won't drag us under into the mess."

The breakfast was not yet cold, and the three now forced themselves to do it justice; but when that duty was done there was nothing for it but to have busty but very good-humored, and manly farewells.

And so they parted.

AT GRAVELOTTE.

It was late in the afternoon of the great battle, and the shattered columns of the French had slowly retired from a shot-torn slope whereon the heaps of slaughter testified to the fierce and obstinate courage and the destroying power of the needle-gun.

A detail of Prussian cavalry was hovering in the valley below as if meditating pursuit, and the leaden rain-drops of war were still falling every where; but all that did not seem to disconcert the movements of a tall figure in dusty dress that moved slowly on from man to man among the dead and dying.

The white cross on his breast indicated that he belonged to the volunteer sanitary corps—that most Christian of modern agencies—and he displayed some skill in the rapid attentions which he gave to one and another of the sufferers.

"I don't mean to die, my dear fellow, no; I must get away from this. Ha, that was a close shot! Hullo, here come some Uhlans! Well, it won't do to die, and I don't think they will disturb me. I'm sure I saw him fall, and not far from here. Ah, God pity his poor mother! here he is. De Senlis?"

"Conway, my friend, you here?"

The question came in a tone of unmeasured astonishment, from the bearded lips of the leader of a small column of Prussian light cavalry or Uhlans, who had ridden rapidly up the slope.

"Ulric, is it you, my dear fellow? Yes, I am here. Did you not receive my card? We have met at Gravelotte, but the count can not welcome you."

"What! De Senlis?"

"It was, ten minutes since, but now—" and even the self-contained Englishman paused for a pause and point to the still quivering corpse.

The blue eyes of the German clouded as he leaned forward in his saddle to look at the white face of his late fellow-tourist.

"Is this Gravelotte?" he murmured, as if speaking to himself.

"That village away yonder," said Conway. "It's the only one I see burning houses among the trees about half-way? That was De Senlis's country seat. I was there this morning with his brother."

Brief was the conference, for, as a bugle-call came pealing up the slope, the sound of which shook his head, waved his hand in farewell, and wheeled his horse to retreat. The last look of Conway's recalled and then straightened in his stirrups, and while two of his men spurred forward to support his falling form, he turned his head, as if with a dying effort, and shouted,

"Conway, I had a message for De Senlis from my sister, if I met him at Gravelotte."

Conway was left standing alone, but the whirling bolts forbade him to follow the rear-guard as it moved toward the retreating lines of the French.

A day or two later a Paris morning paper contained a brief announcement of the sad conclusion of the disasters to the arms of France, the following item:

"An Englishman, who had been one of the most daring and useful spies of our ferocious invaders, under pretense of acting as one of the volunteer sanitary corps, was shot by order of General ——, after the battle. He was acting, however, in several offices of communication with the enemy on the very battle-field. Death to all spies."

The three tourists are still at Gravelotte.

PRIMITIVE MAN.

EVEN more remarkable than the ancient excavations are the rock-shelters which have been inhabited as the dwelling-places of primitive man. In various parts of France many specimens of these early settlements—one nearly a quarter of a mile in length—have been discovered, mere sheltering-places under vast overhanging rocks. Here, perhaps, were built these, all traces of which have long since perished; but man has left more enduring traces of his presence. On the left bank of the river Aveyron, for instance, under the overhanging brows of the rocks on Istier Hill, was discovered a few years ago a deep bed of prehistoric period, as well as a host of objects, the study of which has furnished many data concerning this epoch of humanity. The area covered by this shelter is two hundred and ninety-four square yards. The bones of the bison—though these are comparatively rare—of the ox, of the stag, the elk, the deer, and the chamois are found there, all showing signs of the action of fire. Many pounds' weight of the half-roasted bones of the marrow-fat prove thus that now deceased delicacy formed a feature in the primitive menu. Fish-bones are also found in great quantities; and even skeletons of fish, rudely traced upon fragments of bone and horn. Reindeer's horn was in that stage of man's existence, all that iron is to us. Their arms, their implements, their ornaments, were all made of this substance; and their favorite dainty was the marrow of the long bones, which they extracted by fracture, without spoons. We are sorry to say that these ancestors of ours labor under the suspicion of cannibalism. On certain children's bones of these epochs found in Scotland Professor Owen has recognized the trace of human teeth. Human finger-joints have been detected among the remains of cooking in the epoch of the great bear and mammoth, and also (later) in that of the reindeer. In a cave in Northern Italy was found the small skeleton of a child, which had been carefully cleansed and emptied to satisfy the inordinate primeval taste for marrow. Not the least trace of dogs having gnawed any relics of a feast of this epoch has been discovered; hence it is declared that these animals had not yet been reduced to a state of domesticity. It is also proved that men wore clothes. A large number of reindeer antlers have been found with certain cuts at their base, which evidently could only have been produced in having the animal. Nay, these dandies were not content with the mere skins; flint scrapers are every where met with, which they used for scraping the hair off; and bodkins and stilettoes made of flint and bone—exactly the same as are now used by the Esquimaux—for sewing the different pieces together. Certain reindeer bones also give evidence that the sinewy fibres of that animal were used for thread. No metal, however, was yet known; besides the hatchet and the flint knife there was no weapon. The ornaments were made out of the tooth of a wolf, or the bony part of a reindeer. In some places were great emporiums or manufactories of flint weapons. In the cave of Chaleux was found nearly twenty thousand flints chipped into hatchets, daggers, knives, scrapers, scratchers, and spear-heads. Whistles have been also found made from the first joint of the foot of the reindeer. "We ourselves," says Monsieur Figuier, "have had the pleasure of verifying the fact that these primitive whistles act very well." Perhaps the last operation that we find in use is that of mummification, or his own mother, ten thousand years ago! He had certainly eaten dog—bones of this animal, broken by the hand of man, and bearing marks of having been cut with a knife, place that fact beyond question.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A COVENANT apothecary, not a little distinguished for his impudence, in the hope of disconcerting a young clergyman with whom he came to be a man of singular modesty, asked him in the presence of a large company, if a public penalty "Why did the Athenians of old live to such an old age?" To which the clergyman replied: "I suppose the ancient Athenians had no physic."

A little boy, six years old, and a little girl, eight, were playing in the immediate vicinity of a certain building, watching their fantastic shapes when the boy exclaimed, "Oh, Mollie, look at the shadow in the sky!" "Well, Willie," replied the maiden, "it must be a sky-lanterr."

In New York parlance, after propounding the customary hymeneal conundrums, thus closes the ceremony: "In the name of the people of the State of New York, I pronounce you man and wife; and you are hereby sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of New York." We vote the Democratic ticket every time it comes round.

"Well, Pat," asked the doctor, "how do you feel to-day?" "Sure, docther dear, I enjoy very good health entirely. The curnaties are very attentive, and the docthers, I've no fault to find with them, and me been a-sittin' up all night on a goose-bone's egg, so while I stand up I lie down immediately."

Some girls are like old muskets; they use a good deal of powder, but won't go off.

A wager was laid on the Yankee peculiarity to answer questions by asking another. To decide the point a down-Easter was interrogated: "I want you, sir, to tell me how to give me a straightforward answer to a plain question." "I kin do it, mister," said the Yankee. "Then why is it New Englanders always answer questions by asking one in return?" De facto? was Jonathan's reply.

A YOUNG LADY'S SOLILOQUY.

Uselessly, aimlessly, drifting through life,
What was I born for? For somebody's wife,
I am told by mother. Well, that being true,
Somebody' keeps himself strangely from view;
And if naught but marriage will settle my fate,
I believe I shall die in an unsettled state.
For, though I'm not ugly—pray, what woman is?
You might easily find a more beautiful phiz—
And then, as for temper and manners, 'tis plain
That I'm not to be married for either, in vain.
No, in spite of these drawbacks, my heart is yearning,
And I should not feel grateful "for better or worse"
To take the first booby that graciously came,
And offered those treasures—his home and his name.
I think, then, my chances of marriage are small;
But why should I think of such chances at all?
My brothers are, all of them, younger than I,
Yet they thrive in the world, and why not let me try?
I know that in business I'm not an adept,
Because from such matters most strictly I'm kept;
But—this is the question that puzzles my noddle—
Why am I not trained up to earn my own bread?
Why am I not taught to be strong, like a man?
Why should I wait to be "Somebody's" wife?

"See here, I can't pass you," said the door-keeper at a theatre to a man who was trying to slip by unnoticed. "Can't you?" said he, stand still, then, and I'll get you." And get him he did.

PEN-HUSTING TIMES—Before tight lacing.

"MARY, why did you kiss your hand to the young gentleman opposite this morning?" said a careful parent to his blooming daughter. "Why, the fellow had the impudence to throw a kiss clear across the street to me, and, of course, I threw it back indignantly. You would have me encourage him by keeping it would you?" Suspicious paternal relative is convinced that he does not encourage impudence.

Love is an internal trassport. So is a coat-boat.

A boot-black, having taken a situation in a store to sweep out and run errands, was questioned by some former associates whether he got as good as when in business for himself. "Well, its hard to be honest in crowd, was the reply; "I only get a kick on the nole man."

I love to see the rain decreed,
When I've a good umbrella;
I love to see a pretty lass,
When I am not the fellow.

I love to see a pretty dress,
When I don't have to buy it;
I love to see a plate of meat,
When I don't have to eat it.

A prudent man advised his drunken servant to put up his money for a rainy day. In a few weeks he returned, and very much he had saved. "Faith, none at all," said he; "it rained yesterday, and it all came."

A loquacious author, after chattering some time about the pains he bestowed on his book, said, "I have been intruding on your attention." "Not at all, I assure you," replied Sheridan; "I was thinking of something else."

OMNE. "Oh, ma'am, I always feels it my duty to do the same religion as the family I lives in."

A BAD POLICY.—One that has run out.

A clever not is attributed to the Prince Imperial. When asked why people always said "Prince ——," instead of "Prince ——," Bruce on a cannon," he replied, "Because a cannon always recede when it is fired."

"You ought to acquire the faculty of talking at home to the best society," said a fashionable aunt to an honest nephew. "I manage that every evening," responded the nephew, "by staying at home with my wife and children."

HERCULES. "If I were to lose you I would never be such a fool as to marry again."

OMPHALE. "Well, I'm sure you I would marry again directly."

HERCULES. "Then my death would be regretted by at least one person."

WIFE. "By whom?"

HUSBAND. "My successor."

UHLANS BURNING A FRENCH VILLAGE.

THE UHLANS.

WHAT the Cossack was to an earlier generation of Frenchmen the Uhlan is to their descendants. Mysterious in name and ubiquitous in his movements, the blue-and-yellow horseman, with the heavy revolver in his belt, causes at once bewilderment and alarm. Uhlan is the Polish word for lancer, and is said to be derived from a Tartar root signifying brave, a vestige perhaps of Mongolian invasions.

But the Prussian lancer has nothing non-Germanic about him but his name. He is, in fact, a thorough Teuton, cool, hardy, intelligent, and good-humored, the beau idéal of a modern light-cavalry man. The officers speak both French and German, and are well acquainted with the topography of the country. When the armies are on the move the Uhlans are thrown out in front and on either flank. They mask the movements of their own forces while they pick up all possible information about the enemy. They tear up railways, cut telegraph-wires, and act as foragers for the main force. Mounted on wiry horses, mostly from the eastern provinces, and broken into small detachments, they are often left for days together to their own resources. The officer in command acts on his own responsibility. If he succeeds, he is employed again, and may hope for speedy promotion. If he fails, he is at once recalled, and serves for the rest of the campaign with the main body of the army.

The tales told of the enterprise and daring developed under this system are almost fabulous. Five hundred of these Uhlans covered the whole line of the frontier during the anxious fortnight in which the German forces were being mobilized, and succeeded in persuading the French marshals that they were the advanced guard of a large force. A party of five took tranquil possession of the town of Chalons, awing the inhabitants with their revolvers, and coolly smoking their pipes while they issued orders to prepare supplies for the troops which were on their way. At Hagruenau, Nancy, Bar-le-Duc, resistance was in like manner crushed by sheer audacity. At once bold and wary, reckless of their lives, but careful to avoid unnecessary encounters, they are the eyes of the army: and the marvellous precision with which the operations of the campaign have been conducted is due, in great measure, to the active intelligence of the Uhlans.

One of our illustrations on this page represents a band of Uhlans making a requisition for food at a farm in Ardennes. Another represents the burning of a French village by these modern "Pandours." This is a too frequent spectacle; though, as a rule, the German troops are by no means disorderly.

MASTERLESS.

(See illustration on Page 665.)

Is his harness-thongs of glory,
With his bridle blown before,
Comes a steed of heroic story,
With his fetlocks steeped in gore.

He has been where deeds most deadly
Their way through the carnage won;
Where bullets rained fiercely, deadly,
From Chassepôt and needle-gun.

Where art thou, O gallant Master?
Is thy race of glory run?
This eclipse of dire disaster,
Has it quenched thy noon-day sun?

For years upon years together
He listened to thy command;
Loving friends, come wind, come weather,
He obeyed thy guiding hand.

Say, where art thou, noble Master!
Since dark fate ordained thy hold,
And, thy destroyer flying faster,
In the dust thy glory rolled?

He is free, while thou art lying
In a bondage worse than death;
He is free, thy aid defying.
He who kept upon thy breath!

Free! For what? For wildly straying?
Better thou wert here again!
Free! For shaft-toil worse than slaying?
Would life pray were on his rein!

Say, O France! amid disaster,
Is no dream of glory gone!
Freed thyself, my noble Master
Captive lies, Napoleon!

MRS. LORME'S LITTLE PLOT.

By ANNIE THOMAS.

THERE were great preparations down at Woodside during the whole of the first week of a bright and not very long past July. And as all things that went on at Woodside had a vital interest for me, I was rather agitated by my own and other people's speculations concerning them.

Woodside was the great Johnston "place," in fact, of our Midlandshire village. And Woodside, to my inexperienced and partial eyes, was a very great place indeed. It was free to confess that my eyes were inexperienced, for I had never in my whole life of eighteen years been in Chalton. That they were partial may be gathered from the fact that I had given my heart and plighted my troth to Alfred Lorme, only son and heir of the owner of the Woodside property.

My father was the cadet of a good, poor, clever, versatile family, and he inherited a fair share of the gentleness, poverty, cleverness and versatility of his race. He had commenced life as a midshipman in the Royal Navy, but had soon been compelled to quit the service, which he always continued to love almost enthusiastically, through the sphere of a martyr. On land he was a brilliant humorist, and he was a polished classicist. The combination made him of much account in the critically discerning few, but brought him little money from the voracious-for-mere-amusement many.

However that may be, it sufficed to say here that he made enough by his pen to live a life of lettered ease in a retired English village, to bring his children up with guarded care, and to educate them well. My two brothers have since received and honorable university careers, were launched on the world respectively—the elder as a tutor to youths about to enter the civil service, and the younger as a barrister and a leading-article writer on the most paying staff of our Dailies." Thus, though I lived a life of rural seclusion in the flesh, in the spirit I was on a far more familiar contact with much of the thought and power of the day—as evidenced by the treatment of the most exciting political, literary and social topics. It is no outbreak of intellectual vanity, then, for the truth, told in order to show the reader better understand my position, to say that, though I had scarcely been beyond the borders of my own paddocks, the fact would not have been apparent to any one who heard me discuss the new books, pictures, and authors intrigues which were moving the current interest of the world.

My father spent several weeks of every year in London; but he had either never thought it necessary to give me a taste of a season, or he had not the money wherewithal to do it. Whatever the cause, the effect was the same. When he went down to be lionized by certain circles, I remained at home improving the shining hours to the best of my ability.

I say to be lionized in certain circles advisedly, for though Anthony Thorne lived in obscurity, his talents, and his ability to use them most powerfully by his pen, were widely recognized and cordially appreciated. The only reward not that he was not better paid for what all were constantly spoken in declaring to be thorough work they mightily drew.

During one of these absences of my father's—left as I was to my own devices—struck up a quiet friendship with Gertrude Dene, the squire's eldest daughter. She was a very ordinary type of young English country lady. Quiet, gentle, fair, inane. Yet, notwithstanding this last quality, capable of scratching when occasion served. She happened to be in one of her chronic love-fits just then; so I answered the purpose of a confidante—a touch-stone for envy she could whet some of her spurious sentiments.

There had never been much intimacy between us previous to this. The Woodside people were rich, as riches go in that county-side, and we were poor. Moreover, the Woodside people—the female portion of them at least—were quite up with the neighborhood, lord by a pigeon-shooting match. Mine was to become an authoress, and win a place in the British Pantheon.

"Alfred will be down for the match," she said to me one morning: "he has quite distinguished himself at Haringham, and I find Lord Boynton knows him; when Alfred is here we shall give a large dinner, and you must come to them, Annette." She said this rather patronizingly, but I forgave the patronage on that occasion for the sake of the pleasure it might open up to me. A series of parties at Woodside sounded well—a glad a note of promise in my ears, at that time, as a series of entertainments at Compiègne can in the ears of a practised Parisian habitué.

Well! The pigeon-shooting match was held, and Alfred Lorme won the cup. I remember I felt sick and sorry for the fourteen dove-colored birds that fell to his gun in equal numbers; but I thought him a hero for all that. When he brought the cup to show to me, as I sat in my little parlor-window with his sister by my side, I thought him a god, and when he made me take the first sip of Champagne out of his prize, I was in love with him.

"You never told me he was so clever," I said to Gertrude that night, as she was filling a spray of the maidenhair fern in my hair.

"How do you know he is clever?" she asked, suspending operations abruptly, and looking down at me with the sharply spiteful look that only pale blue eyes can give; "he hasn't spoken to you, has he?"

"Why, he was talking to me for an hour at least," I replied, indignantly.

"What! Lord Boynton! When?"

"No, not Lord Boynton. I meant your brother," I laughed.

"Oh, Alfred," she said, with a relieved air; "I don't care how he is clever—we all are, you know. Mamma always says it was no trouble to teach us, we were so stupid."

"Did your mamma ever try it?" I asked, demurely; for Mrs. Dene was notoriously a boneless, jelly woman; and though I was in love with her son, I was not by any means blind to her shortcomings.

"Of course not," Gertrude said, haughtily; "we had governesses without end. There! that will do; you really look charming, Annette, and I'm sure you'll make a conquest of Lord Boynton. I mean your brother," I laughed.

"Oh, Alfred," she said, with a relieved air; "I don't care how he is clever—we all are, you know. Mamma always says it was no trouble to teach us, we were so stupid."

But at this juncture Gertrude and I seemed to be very much together. Whenever we took long walks and drives—the one luxury I was mistress of was a pony-carriage, and together we made a gallant figure in the fields. Her day-dream at that time was to marry a young nobleman who had strayed into the neighborhood, lured by a pigeon-shooting match. Mine was to become an authoress, and win a place in the British Pantheon.

"Alfred will be down for the match," she said to me one morning: "he has quite distinguished himself at Haringham, and I find Lord Boynton knows him; when Alfred is here we shall give a large dinner, and you must come to them, Annette." part move frequently to their children, would work marvels in the way of establishing that noble system of mutual trust which is the real basis of family happiness.

I was lured, despite my resolution to do nothing more clandestine, into having a meeting with Alfred Dene the following morning. He told me, apparently, a good deal about his private affairs. That is to say, he told me several things that made me take rather a forlorn view of our prospects of ever being more than another than we now were.

"You see, being only a treasury-clerk on £100 a year, it would be madness on my part to think of marrying on that," he said, mournfully.

"But marriage is a thing of the future; concealment in the present is all I dislike," I urged vehemently.

"My darling, you talk like a child; you were reasonable enough the other day; now you are unreasonable, and a little unjust. We have not our attachment, it would be talked about and opposed, and—and—I'm sure you're too delicate minded to desire notoriety of that sort."

"I'm too delicate-minded to like deceiving my father," I said, piteously. "Oh, Alfred, if you knew how grandly gentle he was in his treatment of me when he first found out that I had some thing to conceal!"

"Has he found out that?" he interrupted, in a most authorizedly alarmed way.

"Yes, he has. My father is not indifferent to me, or to what concerns my honor and happiness," I said, in a little high-flown fashion. "He was pardonable enough considering my age and the circumstances."

"Then I find out what it is soon," Alfred said, with genuine annoyance. "I did think you cared more for me, Annette—you do, you must love all that this will entail. As sure as a gun, my mother will get my father to cut off my allowance."

"What a price to pay for your love!" I thought, but I only said,

"You shall not be such a sufferer; I will tell my father this, and then your family will be spared. I will say to him that I have been led on a dream, but that I'm awake now; in other words, I will tell him that there is nothing more between us."

"In other words, you will make him believe me to be a rascal," he said, wrathfully. "Upon my dear girl, I am not going to give you up, I can tell you that. I consider it a most unjustifiable concealment, and you're off on the high ropes at once, like a woman. You don't want to have done with me, Annette?"

He put his arm round me as he spoke, and pressed his lips to mine. And, God help me, I was. I ashamed to be the cheat, and let the man persuade me against my own judgment.

"I have a Spanish's holiday's moment," he said, presently; "let us spend it in peace; let us make it an idyl—a sunny spot to look back upon, whatever event."

I did not like the possible meaning of the two last words; but I did like him so much at that time I agreed that it would be a delightful thing to do; only how were we to do it?

"Meet me here every morning," he said, promptly. "You won't grudge me an hour or two, will you, my love, my darling? And as me here, where no prying eyes can see us, and no inquisitive ears hear us. 'Stay with me, lady, while you may,'" he continued, passionately, quoting Owen Meredith, of whose writings, by-the-way, he knew me to be inordinately fond at that time; "for life's so sad, this hour's so sweet."

"And of an evening you will be distant to me and devoted to Mrs. Lorne?" I questioned.

"Phaw! Mrs. Lorne—she's a bore, that's all," he said, in some confusion. "The people at home take it for granted that I ought to be at her beck, and I am obliged to humor their suspicions, that's all." Then he looked at his watch, and said it was time to go, and I was free to go into the house and await the arrival of my self-invited guest, Mr. Lorne.

She came at length, looking lovelier than she had looked on the previous night, and for a few minutes I felt more jealous of her than before. But my passion for flesh and gore came to the relief of even greater misery when she said:

"I'm an older woman than you, Miss Thorne; but I wouldn't rest my claim to be heard by you on that fact alone, if I didn't take a great interest in your family. Don't look any thing to do with Alfred Dene. I venture to say this because I know him to be a most insidious wooer and a most unvirtuously man."

Again an ice-bolt went through my heart, but I was dumb.

"They, the girls, think that I am here because I love their brother," she resumed; "I wish for the truth is that I am here solely because I love yours."

The vivid blush that spread over her beautiful face as she spoke, the pure, proud light that came into her eyes, testified to her truth. Wonderingly I waited to hear more.

"Albert and I were only just engaged when I got this invitation from the Dowager, and in spite of your beauty from your brother, I judged, and judged rightly I fear, that Mr. Alfred Dene would not have known your virtues long true to himself and false to you. So I begged Albert to keep silence about our little plight, and we have been down here. I have not come too soon, Alfred Dene is a traitor!"

"How dare you say it of him?" I sobbed.

"Because it is the truth. I marked his reserve toward you but night: it is a manner that I have seen him adopt to another girl whom he had led into the error of believing in him. I marked his agitation this morning when he came to me with his false vows—"

"Vows to you!" I muttered out.

"Vows to me. Have I not what his soul loves—money?" she said, calmly. "I would not desecrate my engagement to your brother Albert by telling him of it. I only required him with the scorn he merits. That was at twelve this morning. Tell me the truth, dear child. Is he not with you since then?"

I bowed my head in silent shame, and she generously would not press me to words.

"Dear Annette," she said, kissing me, "treat this matter as it deserves to be treated. Tell me that you hate for what he is, and have done with him; or, stay—give him one lesson. You will not object to humbling a thing so mean?"

"What will you have me do?" I asked.

"Do? Come up to town to-day with your father; I will go too; but they must not know that we are in town. I will tell your papa all to your father, and if he approves of it you will consent?"

I agreed to this, still being in a dream, and before nightfall I was located with my father in the Langham Hotel.

They considerately said nothing to me about my discomfiture for the next few days, during which time I learned that Mrs. Lorne and Albert Lorne appeared to be very busy. At the end of the five days they told me that they were going to be married, very quietly, at St. George's, Hanover Square, the following day." Only papa and myself will be present, Annette, and perhaps one other friend," Albert said.

"Who is the other friend?" I asked.

"Well, I hope you'll not object; but, knowing how fond Alfred Dene is of every thing connubial, I have sent him a line to say that I am going to make a secret marriage to-morrow, and to beg him to do me the service of being my groomsman. It will be the easiest way for you to get out of your little difficulty with him, dear, without a regular explanation which would entail all that sort of thing; seeing the conjunction of Trixy, you, and myself, he will conclude that it is soon enough, and you will be free without loss of dignity."

I did not like the idea of such a denouement to my first romance, but I had been such a weak guide to myself that I could not do other than I felt guided now. Accordingly I dressed the following day I arrayed myself in the pretty bridesmaid's dress that Trixy had made for herself, and sent for by her own milliner, and went to St. George's with my father.

We all assembled to arrive together. My brother and his groomsman had barely had time to reach the altar-rails and range themselves on either side of the bride, when the pale, lanning on the arm of an old friend, her lawyer, were close upon them. The service commenced at once, and it was not before I found the courage to look up at Alfred Dene's face. It was as pale as death, and he palpably had to summon up himself strongly in order to remain to the end.

When we were signing in the vestry he took his hat up, and, with a brief "wish for her welfare" to the bride, he went away without a word to the others. My father followed him out into the square, and there spoke his last words to the found-out man. He told me their substance afterward.

"I am afraid that you were a little disappointed at this morning's news," he let it be warning to you not to dabble in any thing clandestine again, and be thankful that you are being humbugged and not get a horse-whipping.

On the whole I am thankful for my experience. I took to my pen earnestly after my expulsion, and my pen has well repaid me. I only write prose fiction; if I wrote poetry I would say, with Lc. E. L.:

"It was not song that taught me love,
But it was love that taught me song."

CHARLOTTE BRONTË.

A VERY gentle, brave, and noble-spirited woman was Charlotte Brontë. Fragile of form, and tremulous as an aspen leaf, she had on occasion of mind and a heroism of moral capable of real things in private life as admirable as any of the fine delineations in her works of fiction. Nothing she has ever done seems to me more truthful, more magnanimous, and more touching than the letter which, in the form of a new edition of her sister's novel of "Wuthering Heights," her family was about to publish. It has been appreciated; not well spoken of by the critics; not well received by the public; and mainly in consequence of its own peculiarities, in no instance of the reality of the characters she had so wonderfully portrayed in their first and best book, but vividness of the so-called "taste of the day," which does not permit contrry squires and others to swear in solid English, every spelling, but only by a first and last letter, and a hushing-up dash, to mark the prudent reticence of disapproval in a profane tongue. There were also some other startling excrescences, but only as the excess of force in the writing of the pictures, all very pardonable in the first work of a young author. "Wuthering Heights" is one of the most powerful novels written in the English language, or any other language. It was therefore a bestowal upon Charlotte Brontë died without receiving any public recognition of her genius, and although the inward fangs of its final sincere were sharp, that certain work, the world might perhaps have had another creation from that to potent spirit; and in any case the feeling of some public acknowledgment that she had not lived, and felt, and thought, and labored in vain, would have helped to smooth her death-pillow, and to have made the brief remaining period of her generous sister's own life more happy. With what earnest emotion does Charlotte Brontë strive in that preface to place her sister before beside, or above, her own; with what noble yet almost tearful energy she seeks to keep down her reproaches of the shallow judgment, the prudery, and want of perception, which had refused to admit Emily to her rightful place among writers of fiction! The ancient Romans used to set up a statue to "Success," and worshiped it as a god. What could the figure have been like, one wonders? Such a deity could not well be of any admirable and substantial as such, in modern times; but, O Discretion! how often do we seem to offer for want of this the best things any full utterly, while, with thine aid, mediocrity in all shapes may become most prosperous!

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE long-continued drought of the past season has not only resulted in the almost every section of the country, and has been almost as remarkable as the unusual heat which preceded it. Much as it has distorted daily residence, in the country have been the chief sufferers. Happy they who have unfailing springs and deep wells! Both crops and cattle have been parched for lack of water. Some complaints have been made concerning the unwholesomeness the cotton water in this city. It is true that the extremely low condition of the water for some season so reduced the natural flow of the Croton River as to render the supply of water entirely inadequate to the demand. Consequently the Chief Engineer of the Croton Aqueduct Board purchased some lakes in Putnam County, the waters from which have been turned into the Croton River above the Croton Dam. The quantity supplied from these sources for several weeks varied from thirty to sixty millions of gallons; and without this city would have been destitute of water. This inconvenience, therefore, to which residents of New York have been subjected was, on the whole, comparatively small. We have to remember the tribulations of wells in country places that are entirely dry, and thankfully bless the trouble the Engineer involved in mere thoroughly filtering the water they use.

Cornell University has received nearly three hundred new pupils this fall. In consequence of the great increase of students four additional professors have been elected, among whom is Mr. O. P. Cornell, a son of the founder. The library of the University already numbers 20,000 volumes. It contains the private library of Professor Goldwin Smith, which was purchased by him; the library of Franz Bopp, Professor of Comparative Philology in the University of Berlin; Goldwin Smith's private library, 1500 volumes, and he has given $2200 for books to be added to it; Professor Willard Fiske, one hundred and 1000 worth of books for the University, and has also lately added to the library 1100 very valuable volumes of manuscript; Mr. William Ely, of Rhinebeck, has given $1200 for mathematical books; Mr. Cornell has given $1000 to a reserve fund, and $500 for agricultural books; the British Government has presented 2400 volumes of Parliamentary Papers, 1611 to 1870, and the volumes will increase at the rate of 100 a year. Numerous others, who are still in Europe, are to be rebound, and the plates, which are on thin paper, are to be backed, at a cost of £1400.

The widow of Audubon, the naturalist, resides in Quarrelle, Richmond, and is over eighty years of age. A short time ago the $50 beautiful copper-plates, from which Audubon's "Birds of America" were printed, were to be sold at auction in this city, for her benefit. She has been granted a life-pension of $1000 a year by the members of the Board of Education, and it could be decided whether the Board would buy them. These plates weigh 1500 pounds, and were engraved in London in 1833 and 1838, at a cost of £20,000. The original drawings which were deposited with the New York Historical Society, $1000 having been subscribed by wealthy persons to purchase them for it.

A French physician, Dr. Magdies, has revived an old practice of administering shot as a remedy for intestinal colic. His method is to take No. 8 shot, after every night washing it with sweet oil, and give a dessertspoonful every half hour. He claims that in five or six hours the pain disappears.

The Crown Prince of Prussia received his English education from Professor Visscher, of Yale College. While the Professor was studying in Germany he became tutor to the young prince, and taught him what he now knows of English language.

In 1835 the Paris Moniteur thus recorded, from day to day, the progress of Napoleon I. from Elba to Paris:

"The unfortunate Napoleon has escaped.

"The Corsican Ogre has landed.

"The Monster has slept at Gap.

"The Monster has Slept at Grenoble.

"The Tyrant has been seen at Lyons.

"The Usurper has been seen in the Environs of Paris.

In the early days of Household Words, the only regular staff-contributors of original articles were Mr. Dickens, Mr. Wills, Mr. Jerrold, and Mr. R. H. Horne. Occasionally an article was jointly written. One day Mr. Dickens and Mr. Horne agreed to write a "Cunard Dock-yard," and the subject being approved, they went early to the place, were objectionably stared at by the dock-yard men, "Mr. Dickens, this article will naturally divide itself into two parts, which we will write each by himself, together—the, works of the dock-yard, and the fortifications and country adjacent to the powerful steamer." Mr. Horne then at once replied that the works of the dock-yard seemed to him somewhat like fortifications soiled and stale. He would meet here again at a quarter of five. I am glad you made that choice," said Mr. Dickens, as they left the yard, "as a school-boy here, and have juvenile memories and associations all round the country-side, your fortifications would have suggested a skirmish." How literary men would have become strong personal feeling on such an occasion before the choice was made. To the point article thus prepared Mr. Dickens gave the title of "One Man in a Dock-yard," thus again making his own personality.

A writer in Good Health says that the average weight, all the year round, of that portion of a woman's clothing which is supported by the hips is "about seven pounds;" and that if a woman was sentenced to carry such a weight about in this way for a number of years, for some great crime, the punishment would be denounced as an inhuman one; yet thousands of women daily endure such a punishment voluntarily, because it is the custom, and because they do not know the bad effects likely to follow it. The writer earnestly counsels women—not to adopt an entire undress, but to wear by turns, best to have their clothing suspended from the shoulders, by which dangerous pressure on abdominal muscles would be avoided.

Bismarck is said to have some poetry in him, and that on approaching Nancy on the Moselle, he became sentimental, and thus addressed the French damsel:

On the banks of the blue Moselle."

I've come to the Moselle."

Bouchet, the colored Freshman at Yale College, is said to have passed by far the best examination of any of the candidates, white and silver candidates. The young man is a resident of New Haven, eighteen years of age, and was graduated from the Academic department school of the city, valedictorian of his class. What he will look like at '74 remains to be seen.

The German soldier finds his sausage as important to him as his needle-gun. The government supplies every man with a sort of sausage to be eaten raw, onion, spices, and bacon. It is so made that it will keep a long time, and, in fact, needs no further cooking, and is only put into hot water when the soldier's pan can be done. It is both palatable and nutritious. In Cologne enormous buildings are appropriated to the manufacture of the sausage, and over two thousand persons employed.

A correspondent interviewed a woman whose family might be considered as belonging to the vagabond order, and the following conversation ensued:

"Good-morning. "What is your occupation?"

WOMAN.—"Well, I s'pose I'm a kind of a beggar to get my living, and to keep the house, and to pay the rent."

"Indeed! Do you beg for your food from day to day, or twenty-one," or what is his trade?"

WOMAN.—"Why, I never had any home, and he don't do any thing to my knowledge but get drunk, and come home and beat me and abuse me."

CORRESPONDENT.—"What does your daughter do?" (A girl of eighteen, who looked old enough to be his face.)

WOMAN.—"She used to work in a factory, but she don't do any thing now but put the streets, and keep me in rum."

"Do you like to be the two children of Israel?"

WOMAN.—"No, Sir; I've tried to make them go to school, and they wouldn't, and I couldn't keep them there; so I let them go where they please, and maybe they'll live to be rich."

The first music printed in New England was in 1698, and the earliest collection preserved was published in 1698, and contains thirteen tunes. In 1718 the first organ in that country was set up in Boston. It remained unpacked for seven months, but when it was set up it became a wonder. One writer says he thought it was "a pretty box of whistles, but an awful way to spend the Sabbath." About the time of the Revolution the custom of "deaconing" out the hymn was established, adopted with regard to the Scriptures, when the deacon persisted in lining out the hymn, he was overborne by the choir, and left the church in a huff, but was generally coaxed by the church. In another case, a deacon waited until the choir finished, and then commenced and sang out the hymn, reflected it by saying: "The world's people have sung, now let us sing it because it is a wonder. One woman brought to old churchmusic was the pitchpipe, then came the tuning-fork, the bass-viol, and the clarionet berretuning-fork, the bass-viol, and the clarionet berretuning-fork, the bass-viol, and the clarionet berret

POPE PIUS IX.

"Farewell, a long farewell, to all my greatness!
This is the state of man: To-day he puts forth
The tender leaves of hope, to-morrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honors thick upon him:
The third day, comes a frost, a killing frost;
And,—when he thinks, good easy man, full surely
His greatness is a ripening,—nips his root,
And then he falls, as I do. I have ventured,
Like little wanton boys that swim on bladders,
This many summers in a sea of glory;
But far beyond my depth: my high-blown pride
At length broke under me; and now has left me,
Weary, and old with service, to the mercy
Of a rude stream, that must forever hide me.
Vain pomp, and glory of this world, I hate ye;
I feel my heart new opened: O, how wretched
Is that poor man, that hangs on princes' favors!
There is, betwixt that smile we would aspire to,
That sweet aspect of princes, and their ruin,
More pangs and fears than wars or women have;
And when he falls, he falls like Lucifer,
Never to hope again."

King Henry VIII., Act II., Scene 2.

THE STRASBOURG CATHEDRAL AND CLOCK.

THE wonder and delight of Strasbourg is the Cathedral—one of the master-pieces of Gothic architecture. Founded by CLOVIS in 510, reconstructed by PEPIN and CHARLEMAGNE, destroyed by lightning in 1007, it was rebuilt in 1015 by ERWIN DE STEINBACH, and finished in 1413 by JEAN HEUTZ, of Cologne, after the tower had been four hundred and twenty-four years incomplete. According to tradition, ten thousand workmen toiled at the holy work for the good of their souls, "all for love, and nothing for reward." An epitome of Gothic art, this Cathedral contains specimens of every style, from the Byzantine upward. Heaven send it a safe deliverance from Prussian shot and shell! let the gunners aim wide of that noble, heaven-piercing spire, which, according to the best guide-books, rises four hundred and sixty-eight feet above the pavement—that is twenty-four feet higher than the great Pyramid, and sixty-four feet higher than St. Paul's, the body of the church itself being higher than the towers of York Minster. The view from this net-work of stone repays the giddiest person. Beyond the dull red roofs, and the high-roofed and many-windowed houses, spreads the whole country of the Rhine and Black Forest, and on the side of France you see those Vosges Mountains, that might have been held against the world. HUGO describes the netting of detached arcades and pillars over the west end of the Cathedral to be like a veil of the finest cast iron, so sharp and bright is the carving of the durable stone; while Dr. WARNELL, comparing the building to an edifice placed under a rich open casket of woven stone, laments the sacrifice of distinctness from the multiplicity and intersection of the lines. The triple portal is peculiarly fine, and is in itself a world of quaint statues and bass-reliefs. The middle arch is adorned with no less than fourteen statues of the Old Testament prophets; on the right arch are the Ten Virgins, and on the left the Virgins treading under foot the Seven Capital Sins. In the Revolution these carvings were destroyed, and the great brass doors melted down into money, but they have been restored with a most reverential care. The choir is plain and simple Romanesque, but the nave is the choicest early decorated German Gothic. The tower's special treasures are the fine stained windows of the fourteenth century, recently restored (spare them, gentle gunners!), the vast marigold window, and the famous astronomic clock, one of the wonders of Europe, comprising a perpetual calendar, a planetarium on the Copernican system, and shows the hour, the day of the week, the month of the year. It was made in 1571, and, after standing still for fifty-six years (a good rest), was repaired in 1842 by a mechanician of the town. We give on this page an illustration of this wonderful clock. This part of the Cathedral is supported by a single pillar of great symmetry, and above the Gothic cornice appears the effigy of ERWIN DE STEINBACH, the architect of this vast building, whose tombstone was discovered, in 1855, in a humble little court behind the chapel of St. John. In an old house at the southwest corner of the Minster Platz there are preserved some curious ancient architectural drawings belonging to the Cathedral.

RAILROAD TRUCKS FOR HOUSES IN PARIS.

So strong is the faith of the peasantry in the impregnable position of Paris that they have voluntarily flocked into the city in immense numbers from the adjacent country. The police have hunted up all the "useless mouths," and sent as many as possible out of the place by the railroads leading to the northwest; but now that Paris is completely invested by the enemy, all within the fortifications must remain and take the chances of war, sharing the discomforts inevitable to a state of siege. The houses will not accommodate the population, and the useless railroad cars have been made available as places of shelter for such as can not find homes elsewhere. Our engraving on this page shows how this design is being carried out.

ITALY.

WHEN the Continental war first broke out the Italian Government was urged to take advantage of the moment to occupy Rome as her capital; but ministers replied, with a certain magnanimity, which apparently secured the public approval for their policy, that it was unfair to press France in the hour of her trial for a settlement of that question. The question is now, however, being settled. The excited state of public feeling has been such that it has been necessary to act promptly in the matter, and thus forestall the party of action.

It was resolved by the King and his ministers to occupy the Pontifical territory with Italian troops. There was a strong agitation in Rome and the provinces, addresses being forwarded to the King, popular placards posted, and the people in some parts at last rising in open insurrection. Colonel De Charette, with the Papal Zouaves, fortified Montefiascone, and declared that with or without the leave of the Pope he, for one, would resist the Italian troops. Signor San Martino, intrusted with a mission to the Pope, carried an autograph letter from the King, begging his Holiness not to oppose the advance of the army, and it was understood that the advance was only delayed until the return of the embassador. His mission was so far successful that orders were issued to the Zouaves to offer no opposition, and several of the prelates were in favor of an arrangement with the King; but to this, it appears, the Pope could not bring himself, but was occupied in framing a protest.

On Monday, September 12, the Italian troops, under the command of General Cadorna, crossed the Roman frontier, their instructions being to occupy such places as asked for their presence, for the safety of the public and the Holy See, and not in the King's name. The inhabitants were not to be molested, and the next step in the drama was to be a vote of the people, annexation or no annexation; and not till that is given is the King to assume sovereignty over the occupied provinces. The troops were enthusiastically received everywhere; Montefiascone was evacuated, the Papal troops contenting themselves at first with cutting the railway lines; but at Civita Castellano they fired at the advance-guard, and then capitulated. Viterbo, Frosinone, and Corneto have been occupied.

The Pope, who was to have gone to Malta, decided to remain in the Vatican, but refused all terms of arrangement with the government of Italy.

CYNICISM.

THAT kind of cynical criticism of life which amounts to a regular depreciation of its highest aims and better labors is founded upon an error which it is very easy to signalize. If the conscience of an observer has been deadened by willful wrong-doing, he immediately inclines to be to and dwell upon the worst or weakest part of the character of each individual; not necessarily to rejoice in it, which would be devilish, but to watch the power which the wrong part in a man may have of defeating the right part in him. But all the while he is imperfectly sensible of the great fact that the good and right are still in the ascendant; or, in other words, that, in the mass, excess and defect correct each other, so that collective sum is a very different creature from A or B taken at hazard out of a crowd. To this is, indeed, a very poor way of putting the case, which might be made much stronger; but room must now be made for a word about cynical criticism of a less malignant order. This chiefly exhibits itself in running down vulgar enthusiasms, and questioning, in a scientific vein, the accuracy of those instinctive generalizations which play so large a part in human affairs. With regard to the vulgar enthusiasms, it is a curious thing that while the great humorists often make us smile at them, they always show them in their true light—that is, as fortresses or intrenched camps made by the better part of the average human mind in its haste to go about its business. We can not all of ways be stopping to chop logic concerning dogs of research or genius in history and literature; just as in life, we find that our general people choose their friends and stick to them, without pausing every now and then to revise the grounds on which their choice was made.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

"FOR ten years past we have been using in our establishment Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machines, and also Sewing Machines of other manufacturers; and after so many years we have arrived at the conclusion that Wheeler & Wilson's Sewing Machines are greatly superior to all others.

"All the parts of their mechanism are so strong that the expense for repairs is merely a trifle. Besides, they can execute a larger variety of sewing than all other machines. The simplicity of their mechanism makes the repairs easy; they do not tire the operator, and make very little noise in running. In a word, they can not fail to be of great value to persons in want of Sewing Machines."—SISTER DOROTHEA, Congregation of Notre Dame, Montreal.

GLITTERING TEETH.

NOT only does SOZODONT impart the whiteness of the purest porcelain to the teeth, but its polish, too. They glisten after being brushed with it like the inner surface of an ocean shell, and the effect of this peerless dentifrice is to render the enamel as hard and indestructible as adamant.

REVOLUTION IN TIN-LINED LEAD PIPE.
PRICE PER FOUND GREATLY REDUCED.
PURE WATER
To satisfy the public beyond the possibility of doubt as regards both the strength and durability of our TIN-LINED LEAD PIPE, we have recently increased the thickness and weight of the several sizes and letters, making them in all cases to correspond exactly with the sizes and letters of the Iron Pipe.
Lead Pipe. This establishes our TIN-LINED LEAD PIPE as the strongest Lead Pipe in use. With the increase in weight we have also reduced the price per pound nearly one-half, making the cost per foot on the several sizes, adapted to plumbing, about the same as heretofore, while the lighter pipes, used so extensively for conveying water from springs and ponds, are reduced in cost fully one-third. The greater density the metal receive, owing to the fact that double the pressure is required to make tin-lined lead pipe, adds materially to their resisting power. Architects and plumbers can not fail to be satisfied that, with weight of metal, and thickness for thickness, a pipe so constructed is decidedly stronger than the ordinary lead pipe. The perfect adhesion of the tin to the lead allows the joints and connections to be made with entire confidence, and without affecting the strength of plumbed work, to which is the particular and widest place for domestic use it is not difficult to determine. Our TIN-LINED LEAD PIPE can be known by our Trade-Mark, which is four ribbed lines running lengthways of the pipe at equal quarter distances. In ordering or making inquiries for price, send bore of pipe required and head or pressure of water. Circulars and samples of pipe sent by mail free. Warranted to be stronger and more durable than Lead Pipe. Also, Traps, Bends, Sizes and Letters. Address the COLUMBIA SHAW, & WILLARD MANUFACTURING COMPANY, No. 8 & 9 Willard Block, New York. THE BURNING OF BAZEILLES.

ONE of the most horrible incidents of the war in France was the burning of the village of Bazeilles, represented in the accompanying illustration. Exaggerated and distorted narratives of this lamentable affair have appeared in the letters of war correspondents; but the statement of an English gentleman who was actually in the village the day it was burned, and saw the Bavarian soldiers setting fire to the houses, relieves it of its worst horrors, and makes it apparent that there was no intention to take the lives of non-combatants. The French soldiers had defended their position in the village, and clung to every house and bit of wood. The Bavarians were so close upon them that some of them were cut off and left in Bazeilles. Here they remained concealed in the houses while the Bavarians passed through. It was only about eleven o'clock that they were discovered. The village was then on fire in several places, and the fire had reached a large house at the corner of two streets. Suddenly from the windows of this house was opened a sharp fire, and the men of the small Bavarian force in the place began to fall fast. The little garrison in the house refused to surrender. The Bavarians fired in vain; and through the closed shutters straw was heaped against the doors and lighted, but the wind blew steadily back, and left the front of the house untouched; and from the cellars and the ground-floor in front the French still kept up their fire. At last their officer fell, mortally wounded, from the window. He was picked up and brought in by the Germans, and soon afterward the remnant of the little force surrendered. There were 200 men of the marines in the house. Their commander would not hear of a surrender, and only forty came out at last unhurt. In other houses other small bands were found. Some of the inhabitants, not soldiers, even women, fired on the Bavarians. This English gentleman saw them taken with the arms in their hands. The men, but not the women, he was assured, would be hanged next day. It is said, however, that other people, who had taken refuge in the cellars, unknown to the German soldiers, were unfortunately stifled by the smoke of the burning houses. But there is no substantial evidence of the enormous act of cruelty that has been alleged. Bazeilles was rather more than a large village—almost a town, of 2000 or 3000 inhabitants, with a church and a mairie. The greater part of its population had fled into Belgium. The church, and all the houses in the place, are destroyed.

THE NATIONAL INTEREST IN THE NEW YORK ELECTION.

THE election in New York has this interest for the country, that, if MR. HOFFMAN should be re-elected Governor, he would be the Presidential candidate of the Democratic party in 1872. It is useful for the country, therefore, to know something of the chief illustration of his political character and career. He has been Mayor of the city and Governor of the State. He is a lawyer of the city, his most memorable act was a proclamation at once denying and defying the testing the electoral frauds, which were not reported only, but known, and by means of which MR. HOFFMAN was elected Governor. His whole conspicuous act as Governor is the signing of the Erie bill, an outrage so flagrant that it has convicted him, in the minds of all intelligent citizens of his own State who are familiar with the facts, either of total incapacity or of utter want of principle. Stung by the consciousness that this great iniquity justly threatens its perpetrator with political destruction, the shrewder Democratic organs are busily engaged now to divert attention from their candidate by slander of General WOODFORD. But the less wary, like the World, actually attempt a defense which is so absurd as to be merely a confession of judgment. Indeed, the full enormity of Governor HOFFMAN'S conduct was never made more conspicuous than by the ludicrous apology of the World.

The facts of the case are simple. Certain notorious persons, among whom are the political inventors of MR. HOFFMAN, became manigers of the Erie Railroad. They presently made an issue of several millions of new stock, the illegality of which proceeding was admitted by their successful application to the Legislature to legalize it. Having thus for the time mastered the rend, they applied to the Legislature to alter the charter, so as to deprive the stockholders of the right to elect a full Board of Directors annually, and enable the Board as well as that of certain other roads to also divide itself into classes, of which only one-fifth should be chosen annually, thus giving the chief managers a control of the road for two or three years, notwithstanding every effort of the stockholders, who had elected them for one year only. The bill was passed in May, 1869, to take effect immediately, and its words are:

"The Board of Directors in each of the said companies may or cause the members of such Board, or any of or otherwise, that, as nearly as may be, one-fifth of their number shall go out of office at each annual election; and at the next election of directors, in each of said companies, directors shall be voted for to fill the place of those whose terms shall then expire in the classification aforesaid."

This was the bill. If the Governor signed it, and it became law, all redress for the stockholders was hopeless; because they could only do by the executive signature would prove that they owned a governor, were already known to own judges and lawyers. By refusing therefore, he which the great veto power is given to the Governor had arisen. He was morally and officially bound to interpose on the defense of the rights of honest citizens, imperilled by ignorance or fraudulent intention. That the Governor clearly understood the enormity of the bill is plain from his long hesitation in signing it. He retained it nearly a fortnight. But the power behind him could not be resisted, and with the feeblest effort at justification of an act which, if honorable and proper, needed no more justification than his signature, he at either bill, he signed the bill depriving honest citizens of the control of their own property, and giving it to persons whose reputation was notorious.

The expression of public opinion upon the subject was instant and most emphatic. All leading papers had forcibly called the Governor's attention to the enormity of the bill while he was still hesitating to sign it. Then, as soon as it was —a Democratic paper in this city, which constantly informs us that MR. HOFFMAN is a great "statesman" —speaking of the bill immediately afterward, said that if a man owned the whole stock of the Erie Railroad he could no more obtain control of it before it was opened than could it run among the mountains of the moon. It declared that the Erie bill "organized the monstrous injustice," and added: "The Erie bill is simply indefensible—it was not even defended by the independent Democratic press of the country when severely attacked by the Republican press as bearing Governor HOFFMAN'S signature." And when a proposition was made, in the last House of Democratic Legislature, to repeal the bill, the World said:

"If the attempt now making to repeal the charter act passed last spring is keep Messrs. GOULD, FISK, TWEED, and LAW in office as Directors of the Erie Railway Company four years beyond the period for which they are elected should succeed in both branches of the Legislature, we suppose there can be no doubt that Governor HOFFMAN will sign the repealing bill. If there is any chance to expel the evil, it is supremely folly to ratify the mistake he made in approving that piece of legislation, and confound it so. Hence to repeal the bill it was with a formal apology. He will need no apology for signing a repeal."

This expressed the universal sentiment. Then began the but one opinion among honest men in the State of Governor HOFFMAN'S conduct in signing the bill. But the same World, which is now as subservient as Governor HOFFMAN himself to the persons for whose purposes the Erie bill was signed, has recently attempted a defense of the bill which it has already denounced as indefensible and knavish. It says, in the first place, that this is the only charge alleged against him by the public conduct of MR. HOFFMAN, which is not true; for his proclamation as Mayor, protecting the electoral frauds, and his appointment of judges under the new constitutional provision, equally expose him to the censure and suspicion of all honest men. But even if it were true, what is the argument? To say that the Governor must be spotless if this is the only charge against him is but to say that when only charge against a man of an enormous theft, "Very well, what then? He never stole any thing else, and is therefore supremely an honest man." It says, in the second place, that a Republican legislature passed the bill, and therefore the Republicans are equally responsible with the Governor. This does not follow, because the scope of a bill may be dextrously concealed by those who introduce it at times and under colo ur it through the forms of legislation. Moreover, legislators may be absent, may be inattentive, may not understand the bill.

But in the worst aspect, supposing that the Republican majority was bribed to vote for what the World called a "knavish" and "indefensible," "monstrous" bill, what is the substance of its reply to the charge that the Governor involved his State in the "most foul" way, with other officers betrayed their trust." If the Republican Legislature passed a monstrous and knavish bill, it was the part of the Governor to veto it. The veto was given him for that very purpose. But, of course, the Governor could not veto a bill unconstitutional until it is passed by the Legislature; and yet Governor HOFFMAN, with incredible folly, actually demanded the fact that this bill was passed as a reason for not vetoing it. He said, "No serious opposition was made to it in either House." Why not? Because it was not understood. But it was his duty to understand it. "The stockholders on the several roads have not presented objections." Why not? Because they did not understand it. When they did—but let the World tell us about it. "In reviewing his action in this matter, it will not avail the absence of protests, which since have been numerous enough to indicate that general sentiment," &c. Does the Governor mean to say that he will sign any knavish, indefensible, monstrous bill, if there is no protest against it? He does not seem to know that it is the duty of the Executive to protect against legislative knavery, and to make his protest effective.

There is alleged this in the principle of the Erie bill is that of the provision in the United States Constitution for the classification and re-placement of Senators. Will the World defend this case? The Senators of the United States were elected with full and universal knowledge of that provision. But the Erie bill was not seen by reference to its text, which we have already quoted, empowers the Board of Directors, elected for one year, to vote to re-elect themselves, and the act takes effect immediately. The moment that the Governor signed the bill, the election in March last was nugatory to put there to protest against legislative knavery, and to make his protest effective.

tianity and religion with the political authority of a bishop. How much wiser is Archbishop PURCELL, of Ohio, who said, upon returning from the Œcumenical Council, "I believe it would have been a happy thing for the Church if kings had never pretended to be her protectors..... All we want is a free field and no favor. Truth is mighty and will prevail. We are here, side by side, with every sect and denomination of Christians. It is for the people to judge which of us is right, which of us teaches that which is most conformable to the Holy Scriptures. Then if they approve our religion, let them embrace it; if not, reject."

This is sound doctrine from the lips of Archbishop MANNING, whose words sound like a voice of the futile despair which Cardinal ANTONELLI doubtless feels.

PRIVATE GLIMPSES OF PUBLIC MEN.

THE private correspondence of LOUIS NAPOLEON has fallen into the hands of the new Government in France, and the question is suggested, How much of it ought to be revealed? Has an emperor lost the privileges of other men allegiance? While state secrets and plans injurious to the public welfare may very properly be exposed, ought his personal intrigues to be published? The question is one that we first suggested a few years since by MR. PARTON'S article upon DANIEL WEBSTER. MR. PARTON stated plainly that, upon more than one occasion, when MR. WEBSTER addressed the public he was overpowered by wine. There was an malignant interest from some persons in it as an unpardonable indignity to publish such a fact, that the public was interested in the great qualities, and not in the little faults of MR. WEBSTER, and that a decorous sensibility would have veiled his lapses in silence.

Then decorous sensibility would have been a very poor historian. What we really wish to know about great men more than of any other is the truth. HOW WILLIAM PITT drank, we two Speakers instead of one, there is no harm in saying so, however painful it may be. If DR. FRANKLIN was a man of loose morals, why should decorous sensibility represent him as a passionless sage? If WASHINGTON lost his temper at Monmouth, and swore roundly, why should decorous sensibility skip the oath? Whatever is necessary to show the man as he really was it is essential that the historian should record. MR. SPARKS once corrected the grammar of some of WASHINGTON'S letters. It was kindly, but surely unjustifiable done. And it is precisely that kind of polishing and trimming which made FIELDING say that the difference between novels and history is that in the novel every thing is true except the names and dates, and in history nothing else.

In the case of LOUIS NAPOLEON every thing which is essential to a true knowledge of the man may properly be published. There is no good reason that Frenchmen should suppose him to have been a religious man if he were not so, nor a truthful man if he told lies; nor a learned man if he were ignorant; nor a continent man if he were unchaste. Many a public evildoer has been exonerated upon the ground of his private personal virtues. But if a ruler who has caused countless homes to be ruined and faithful hearts to be broken, to gratify his miserable lust or personal pique, is also a profound, superstitious, cowardly, debauched man, may the privileges of his private rights be justly pleaded to save him from the exposure of the truth? We do not say that LOUIS NAPOLEON was such a man. But if the evidence which proves it should be discovered, it should certainly be made public. It should be no more concealed than the general moral tone of his court. We are all profoundly interested in knowing whether great public virtues may exist in the same person with great private vices; and whether a man who can govern himself can wisely govern an empire.

THE VOICE OF A GERMAN REPUBLICAN.

THE Prussian republican leader JACOBY has been arrested for a speech lately delivered by him at Konigsberg, in which he said what appears to be distasteful to the German Government, but what is certainly very true. In speaking of the demand for the absorption of Alsace and Lorraine as old German provinces which Germany may very properly claim, he begged his hearers not to be deluded; the demand, he declared, was only the old right of the cannon, of brute force, in a new dress. "Have Alsace and Lorraine no people? he asked; may the victor decide their fate according to his own caprice? They are essentially French, he insisted, and it would be inhuman to endeavor to incorporate them with any German state. "Let us," said JACOBY, "firmly maintain the principles of right as much in political as in private life; let us proclaim that any annexation of foreign territory against the will of the inhabitants is a violation of the right of the free disposition of peoples. Without allowing ourselves to be troubled by the momentary intoxication of victory, let us protest against any violence which may be done to the people of Alsace and Lorraine. Those only who respect the liberties of others are themselves worthy of liberty."

Wiser words could not be spoken. They describe a statesmanship which would make the war a blessing, and give Germany the leadership of Europe. The value of the highest principle is yet to be illustrated in state craft, but there is no doubt whatever of its expediency; and if, as we prefer not to believe, Germany should make the cardinal mistake of forcible annexation by the present conquest, she must take the responsibility of the future war which BISMARCK seems to regard as inevitable. If force is to be a power and not a truce between the two countries, it must be founded upon mutual respect. France defeated, dismembered, humiliated, is necessarily an implacable foe. An annexation by conquest will be but a provocation and justification for reannexation by conquest. And if a statesman like BISMARCK is unable to see that brute force can settle no state question except by the total destruction of opposition, we must postpone the day of the greater statesman like JACOBY.

It will be observed that in the speech of the German republican there is no war cry. In the phrase of Artemus Ward, JACOBY, like WASHINGTON, does not "slop over." He states calmly and temperately the central idea of his opposition, and we must regard his arrest, if really occasioned by this speech, as is alleged without contradiction, as a very serious outrage of the German Government, and an unpleasant sign of its probable intentions in settling the terms of peace. It will be a misfortune if the sympathy of the world, which has attended Germany from the beginning of the war, and which has thus far most justly followed its successes, should be alienated by its interpretation of the right of conquest. If Alsace and Lorraine wish to be united to Germany, let them vote. If they do not, to seize them and hold them against their will is to begin endless war.

MASSACHUSETTS REPUBLICANS AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

THE Massachusetts Republican Convention was apparently unanimous upon every point but that of suffrage for women. The nominated Governor CLAFLIN and his associates, who have served the State so well, and it expressed itself plainly upon the duty of the Legislature. Its resolutions cordially approve the Administration, but while they declare the natural pride of Massachusetts in having one of her citizens at the head of the Treasury, they delicately condemn his policy by suggesting that the burden of the debt should be lightened a little with the years, and that taxation should be further reduced. This, indeed, is a measure universally demanded by the party, and one that will be undoubtedly adopted.

The resolutions further declare the party pledged to continued interest in the care of prisons, and to take care that education is secured to them. This resolution comes very properly from MR. HOAR, the chairman of the committee, who, in his place in the House of Representatives, made a powerful and admirable speech upon the ultimate relations of education and republican freedom. The Convention also asserted that the Republican party is distinctively the labor party, pointed to the great and vigorous settlement of the Alabama question, and favored "laws wisely calculated to prevent crippling and remoteness, and secure prompt issue and industry"—a truly sound and conservative resolution!

But MR. HOAR, MR. BOUTWELL and MRS. LUCY STONE, and MR. SLACK and MR. ROBINSON, and other gentlemen, moved and pleaded in vain for the woman-suffrage resolution. The Convention declined to act upon it, and reported it back to the Convention for its pleasure. The Convention did not act upon it, and it had yet become a question upon which the party was unanimous or prepared to speak, and so declined to declare itself. But LIVERMORE and other able movement be adopted by the Republican party, by which it naturally belonged, and that its friends should not be to the Democrats for its support, surely nothing could so show the utter hopeless of the leaders of the movement as an appeal to a party which has no principle whatever with political progress or reform. Do they expect the party of caste, of ignorance, of hostility to every social reform, to be induced heavily to so vast and radical a reform as that involved in woman suffrage? Even if the Democratic Convention should hold the balance of power and be induced to accept some of the Democratic party, does any thoughtful advocate of woman suffrage think that the cause would be nearer its goal?

The great body of the friends of all rational progress in this country are in the Republican party, and no special good cause can gain, in the present condition of affairs, by the destruction of that party. As TALLEYRAND said that every body knows more than any body, so now the general national welfare is more important than any particular cause. The temperance reformers, the labor reformers, the revenue reformers, the suffrage reformers, should think long and well before they connive at the overthrow of the great organization of whose action they are all sure, so far as public opinion rigens, and without the support of that opinion success is impossible.

The success of such movements in the Republican party is organic development, but in the Democratic party it is a trick or an experiment. The Republican party always and wisely declares a little less than it believes in its own direction. It is even better than its word.

Democratic development should inspire in all friends of intelligent progress the most ascist of fears—that of the Greeks bringing gifts.

And this conservative parties, as such, are more than organizations for specific purposes, but because, as a fact, the moral and political intelligence of the country is at present in the Republican and not in the Democratic party.

THE USUAL THREAT.

THE organ of the Tammany Ring in New York says that the law of Congress to secure honest election in that city is "calculated to stir the people to resentment," and it very plainly suggests a riot and mob violence as a remedy against a law which makes illegal voting difficult. This is an illustration of the spirit and conduct of its party. In 1861, when some of its chief leaders were dissatisfied with the result of an election, they tried to destroy the government by force of arms. In 1863, when the leaders dread the result of an honest election, they declare the dishonest voters to be the people, and indirectly counsel them to go armed to the polls.

It is for the intelligent and truly conservative voters of New York to say in the country to decide whether a party which incessantly appeals and threatens to appeal to arms is a party that can be safely entrusted with the government of the state and the nation. It was so long the party of the slave-drivers, and so used to brute force as its only support, that it does not even know that, among free and intelligent people, threats are the poorest campaign appeals.

AN UNSAVORY FEAST.

THE New York Times is doing noble service in its treatment of the Tammany Ring. It performs a service which is in the interest of every honest voter in the State and the country. The seditious policy of the Ring is seen in nothing more clearly than in its total subjugation of the World, which is effectively and conclusively exposed by the Times. Last winter when the World declared what it ludicrously called "war to the knife" upon the Ring, there were many persons who believed that it had sufficient character and regard for the public welfare to persist in its words, and that there were honest Democrats enough to support it. The Ring, however, saw that the control of that feast shall not be lost upon the spectators.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE STATE OF AFFAIRS IN FRANCE.

PARIS is now entirely isolated from the rest of France by the continued success of Prussian batteries, and balloons furnish the only means by which the beleaguered city can communicate with the outside world. The most recent occasion was that of M. Gambetta, who left Paris on the 7th inst., but the balloon was accompanied, at the beginning of its voyage, by one containing the Honorable Dorr Green, who has by no means a leaning the besieged city. We confirm the statement that M. Gambetta left Paris on the 7th inst. for Tours. For the purpose of foreign nations did by announcing in Paris had recently held a meeting at the Hotel de Ville to discuss the question in which they were placed by Count Bismarck's refusal to permit the Provisional Government without being consulted, which constitute the diplomatists have unanimously decided to leave Paris. M. Gambetta has been communicated to Count Bismarck; and, should he persist, they will be empowered to suspend all communications with their respective governments. M. Gambetta's journey to Tours is for the purpose of forming a provisional government, and he will return to or three times in those proximity to the Prussians.

The following account is given of the meeting on the 8th inst., by M. Gambetta, at Tours:

"By the advice of the republican government I have left Paris to transmit to you the hopes of the Parisians and the efforts which they are making to deliver France from foreigners. Paris, invented for seventeen days, has accomplished one of two million forgetting by their differences to withstand the invader, who cannot fail to succumb.

"The revolution found Paris without guns or arms of defense, and in twenty days we have created a power of 600,000 men. We have fortified and armed thousand Mobiles and sixty thousand regulars are assembled. The ramparts are covered with artillery of the greatest calibre, and served by gunners the best in the world. Around the city are 300 fortified works constructed by the smallest work. The ouvrage on the 4th had cost 200,000 francs, and the cost of nine hours' cannonading hundred, with four hundred rounds to the gun. Seeing that the enemy's fire was ineffective, the National Guards could not be restrained, and the enemy lost three days of defense—the barricades—which are adapted to the peace of Paris. This has all been done with the most calmly and orderly, amidst general patriotism. The impregnability of Paris is no illusion. It can not be captured or surprised, and there is no danger of sedition or starvation, which the Prussians have been counting on.

The engagements were in position about Paris on the 4th inst., and it was believed that the bombardment would commence on the 5th. The commencement of the battle of Sedan, General Ducrot, whom the Prussians permitted to enter Paris with dispatches for M. Thiers, announced that the garrison and the people are calm, and the appearance of the city such as to break the heart of a spectator. The Paris Soir describes within that the city is good for a six months' siege. It is said that the invaders' cannonade will be preceded by a formal summons to surrender the city. The English people and press are still trying to move the government to act on the question of mediation, but Lord GRANVILLE has yet do not manifest the slightest disposition to move.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Times, a military gentleman who has seen much active service, gives it as his opinion that the Prussians can enter Paris on the 20th autumn season. Nothing, he says, in the way of stone-walls can withstand Krupp's guns and the fire which they can be turned by the Prussian advances. The people are preparing for the bombardment with resignment by being kept at work in their windows. The books from the principal libraries have been removed to the Louvre. The Museum of Natural in the tower of Notre Dame to look out for fires.

Most important events have occurred of the new armies forming in the south of France. It is said that they will number 200,000 men.

Garibaldi reached Tours on the 9th instant. His presence created great excitement. He made a short speech to the Franco-Tireurs, in which he said that he should hasten to join the Republican Army of France to drive the invaders.

Many engagements are reported from several parts of France, with varying success. The cannon captured from the Prussians at Chateaudun, and retaken by the garrison on the 18th ult., in which they are driven back with loss, and the Prussians have left the city. The Prussians have also been defeated on the 4th inst., in which the Germans were worsted, and compelled, in consequence, to withdraw with precipitation, abandoning large numbers of cattle and much forage in the hurry of the flight. Two regiments of the army of the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin were defeated, on the 5th, after Pontanan, by the Gardes Mobiles of the Department of Aisne, garrisoning Soissons. On the 6th inst., the latter combat opened the city of Soissons, one of the strongest fortified town in Eastern France. The Prussians, after a bombardment of twenty-four hours, were unfortunately, and the Chateau Mauregard, and the Cathedral can be easily restored, and that the important Library, University, library, and the public buildings are in ruins. Strangers have begun to arrive, by the Belgian frontier, at Lille, and trade is beginning to revive. The German garrison is 10,000, who have left Lille for the seige.

The prisoners in Belgium, fugitives from the north, are pathetically appealing to the charity of the Belgian, have shown symptoms of revolt, and the Belgian authorities have found them to preserve order.

At Lyons military precautions are being taken in case of a movement in favor of the Empire or Orleans in France. The heights have been fortified, and are garrisoned by 30,000 men.

Bismarck has said that the documents found in the prefatal archives prove conclusively that the French Empire was the author of the war, and that it was important, as furnishing an answer to Bismarck's main argument, for publication.

An Oxford dispatch says that the latest story from Paris is that Bismarck contemplates signing a treaty with Count Von Bernstorff against France in Italy. Prussia is preparing to manage the Italian Republican soires Constantinople. The statement is not credited, and its publication is thought to be a ruse to alarm at Berlin concerning the designs of Russia, and an attempt to bring the popular opinion to Germany.

GENERAL FOREIGN ITEMS.

It is conceded that the plan for taking the vote in the Ecumenical Council on Italian rights will be fair and impartial. All classes except the priests and their supporters will be represented. Intelligence of the spontaneous rejoicing of the Romans on thus ratifying the Italian union, the progress of which continues in the city is marked by the gradual changing of the names of streets, which are being rapidly made to conform to the new order of things. The Pope has not left the city during the entity; but there is now but little doubt that he will soon accept the situation, and throw himself on the protection of the Italian government. General Kanzler has been sent to Rome by the King of Italy to regard the gradual consolidation and annexation toward the Holy See. The Church and the clerical body, and guarantees for the exercise of the supreme spiritual power. The Pope will be allowed a guard of his own guard, at his own request, and has expressed a desire to have the troops in the great square of St. Peter's. A monument is to be erected to those who fell in 1849 in the defense of the Roman Republic. Garibaldi has written a letter to the Roman people, in which he calls on the scaffold in the cause of liberty.

The Belgian journals protest against the threatened at Rome.

More manufactories of arms in China are reported. Troops are also said to be collecting between Pekin and Tien-tsin.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

A PROCLAMATION was issued by the President of the United States, on the 8th instant, appointing the following American neutrality, and warning the vessels of the belligerent powers not to make preparations in American waters.

The census shows that St. Louis is the fourth city of the Union in population. It has doubled since 1860, and now has 310,000 people.

The Grand Jury of Cook County met on Monday, the 10th October 8. The fund subscribed for the completion of the building now amounts to about $100,000.

Miss Etta E. Buxton, a school-teacher, of Canton, Massachusetts, died recently from the effects of an accidental blow he with stones in the hands of pupils. The young ruffians have been arrested.

The Democrats have tested the ability of the Council of the Enfield Brotherhood adopted a short time since, by which the Fenian organization is announced, and the condition of Ireland is reviewed. The Irish Land Democratic democratic Republic England it is believed that the working-men of that country will not be induced to join the Fenian Brotherhood.

At a conference held October 5 at Salt Lake City, Brigham Young restored his position as Trustee of the Church, which he held in 1844, and which position was appointed to succeed him. He holds the position of Trustee-in-trust, and has appointed a board of twelve men to be associated with the trustees in the trust transacted by societies. He was furious against the Gentiles, but he has now to assist every Gentile investment, and would destroy and burn every thing if need be to keep it out of the hands of gentiles.

Five citizens of Columbus, Kentucky, had a "difficulty" on the morning of the 10th instant, which resulted in a free fight. One of them was killed on the spot, and the remaining four received fatal injuries. The fight was desperate, and lasted only three minutes.

The Rev. Dr. Hall, of the Church of the Holy Comforter in the Middle Park, Chicago, has resigned his position as pastor of the church in the forts, and see whether troops are necessary for the protection of that district. A large force of mounted Indians appeared near Bijou Hills, Dakota Territory, on the 10th inst., but left the next time ago, but showed no signs of hostility.

John Gentain, Superintendent of the New York Police Department, died in this city on the 10th inst. He was an excellent executive officer, and was greatly respected by all who knew him.

Fitzhugh Ludlow, an American magazine writer of great talent and versatility, died on the 12th inst., at Geneva, New York, in his thirty-fourth year. He had gone there during a new attempt to recruit his failing health.

PREPARED EXPRESSLY FOR HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNEY THROUGH ICELAND.

CHAPTER IV.

Approaching the Plain of the Geysers.—Its General Appearance.—Provoking Eruptions.—Theories and Facts in Regard to the Geysers.—The Great Strokr.

As the traveler approaches what is called the Plain of the Geysers—the region in which these blasts and explosions of hot water and steam are most abundant, and manifest themselves on the largest scale—the country grows more wild and rough, the crevices and fissures from which steam and sulphureous vapors and odors are emitted become more numerous, and every thing indicates the increasing violence of the internal heat, or at least its nearer approach to the surface of the ground. The country is almost entirely uninhabited, though travelers speak of one turf-covered hut, which they reach in approaching the plain, where a peasant, who serves as a local guide, resides with his family. A more lonely and dreary home for the abode of a human household can scarcely be conceived.

A guide well acquainted with the locality is very necessary in traversing this region, on account not only of the numerous chasms and pitfalls which abound in it, but also of the sulphureous and suffocating fumes which are emitted in certain spots, and which do not, like the vapor of water, make themselves perceptible from a distance to the eye, nor audible like a jet of steam. For steam, in consequence of its rapid condensation in coming in contact with the external air, emits a hissing or roaring sound; or, if it comes forth in sudden bursts, produces a series of detonations and explosions which warn the traveler of his danger.

These sulphureous emanations are alleged by geologists to be derived from the decomposition by heat of a certain mineral called pyrites, which is a compound of sulphur and iron, as is denoted by its chemical name—sulphuret of iron. Sulphur, when pure, and also in many of its combinations, is imbued with the remarkable property of sublimation—that is, the capability of being volatilized directly from the solid state, and afterward condensed again from the gaseous to the solid condition, assuming when thus condensed either the form of crystals or of an impalpable powder called the flowers of sulphur. In consequence of this property, great quantities of this substance in the form of vapor are emitted from volcanoes, and, being condensed again around the margin of the crater, form deposits which accumulate in the course of ages to a vast amount. A large portion of the sulphur of commerce is derived from deposits of this kind in the volcanic regions of Etna and Vesuvius, in Sicily and Italy.

PLAIN OF THE GEYSERS.

THE GREAT GEYSER.

The iron pyrites, from which sulphur is sometimes supposed to be derived, is widely diffused throughout the earth—disseminated generally, where it occurs, in small crystals which tend usually to a cubical form; and, as in color and general appearance it bears a certain resemblance to gold, people unskilled in mineralogy are often deceived by it—so much so that it has obtained the name of fools' gold. Almost every professor of chemistry in our colleges, and every State geologist or assayer, is continually receiving specimens of this mineral, sent in from the country to be analyzed, under the impression that it is gold. The character of the mineral can, however, at any time be easily determined by the stroke of a light hammer. Gold, being malleable, would be flattened by this treatment, but the pyrites is extremely brittle, and will fly to pieces under quite a gentle blow.

There is a third substance, besides the vapors of water and of sulphur, which is brought up from the interior by these volcanic ejections, and that is a silicious mineral which is dissolved by the water under the influence of the great heat below, and then is deposited again around the margin of the opening through which the water issues. The engraving showing a portion of the Plain of the Geysers gives an idea of the character and appearance of these deposits, which form a kind of mound around the orifice through which the water issues like the curb of a well.

The engraving also shows the tent of the traveler pitched upon the plain; for whoever attempts to explore these wonders has no shelter except such as he takes with him on the back of a pony. One of the figures represents the traveler in the act of throwing a heavy stone into an opening, while his guide is bringing another to be thrown in in its turn, with a view of provoking explosions.

For it is a remarkable, and in some respects a mysterious fact, that the ejections of water and of steam from these craters are intermittent, taking place sometimes at considerable intervals, and what is more remarkable still, they can often be excited by throwing a heavy stone or a clod into the opening. This last peculiarity—which was probably discovered by the very first visitors to the Geysers, through the curious propensity which seems to impel every one, grave and gay alike, when they see a hole or chasm or abyss of any kind, to throw the nearest stone into it—was long considered very wonderful and mysterious, as, indeed, were many other things connected with these extraordinary phenomena. The explosive bursts which followed the throwing of the stone seemed like the expression of life and passion, as if there were a monster within, who resented the entrance of the missile as an attack from an enemy, and the explosion which ensued was the expression of his wrath and defiance.

A great many theories have been advanced, and a great many speculations offered, in respect to the cause of the intermittent and irregular action of these springs. The tendency of most of the springs is to remain quiet for a time, or at least only to boil and fume with moderate violence, and then, after intervals varying in length, either spontaneously or from the stimulus mysteriously imparted by some shock given to them from without, to burst into a violent explosion, by which, in the largest of them, a column of water several feet in diameter is thrown one or two hundred feet into the air. The explanation of such a phenomenon must be in a great measure conjectural, but there are some scientific considerations connected with it which may involve the elements of an explanation, and, at any rate, which it may be useful and interesting to the reader to understand.

First, then, there is a mysterious connection between the presence of air in water and the manner in which the process of ebullition goes on when the water is heated to the boiling point. It is found that when all the air which, under ordinary circumstances, is combined with water is exhausted from it, the water may be heated somewhat above the boiling point without boiling, and then it tends to burst into sudden and great developments of steam. In other words, it boils continuously and quietly while it contains air, but when it is deprived of air the ebullition takes place in a series of sudden evolutions of masses of vapor, which have to some extent the character and effect of explosions. Now, as we may easily suppose that the water, at great depths among the volcanic strata, may become entirely deprived of air, it is not impossible that the principle above explained may have some connection with the intermittent and explosive character of the emission of steam and water from the geysers. This is perhaps the more probable from the fact that the sudden bursting of the water into vapor, in the case above described, seems to be produced by any disturbance of the water, and even to be connected with any inequalities or roughness of the interior of the vessel containing it.

Secondly, the degree of heat at which water is converted into steam depends upon the pressure to which it is subjected. At the surface of the earth, where the ordinary pressure is about fifteen pounds to the square inch, it boils at 212° Fahrenheit. But upon the top of a mountain, where the pressure is less, it boils at a lower heat, or temperature. At the bottom of a deep mine, where the pressure is greater, it would of course require a higher temperature to boil it. So true is this that there is an actual though not very great difference in the degree of heat required to boil a tea-kettle in a farmer's kitchen, depending upon the difference in the pressure of the atmosphere, as indicated by the barometer, on different days.

Now the pressure bearing upon the lower portion of a column of water in a crevice or cavity in the rocks, extending some hundreds or thousands of feet into the interior of the earth, is enormous, and it would consequently require a very intense heat to boil water under it. It was said that Arago Perkins, in the experiments that he made many years ago with his steam-gun, subjected water to such a pressure that it would make it red-hot without allowing it to boil. It would be easy for a person conversant with the subject to calculate the depth below the surface of the earth at which the pressure would be sufficient to enable water to endure a given temperature and still remain liquid.

The pressure upon the lower portions of a column of water a thousand or fifteen hundred feet in length—a distance to which it would not be at all unnecessary for crevices and fissures in the crust of the earth to extend—though the force of it might easily be expressed in figures, would be really so great as entirely to transcend all human powers of conception; and water subjected to such pressure would endure a degree of intensity of heat before it would be converted into steam. If, now, we suppose that a portion of water, which is subjected to this heat and pressure, were suddenly transferred to the surface of the earth, where the pressure would be at once reduced to the rate of fifteen pounds to the square inch, it would instantaneously burst into steam with all the force of the most violent explosion.

Such a sudden transfer from so great a depth to the surface would be impossible; but it may easily suppose that the lower portion of the column might be slowly forced upward by water formed in small quantities at a still greater depth below it, until it reaches a level where the pressure would be so far relieved as to allow a portion of it to flash off into steam, and to throw up the column of water sufficiently to produce such an explosion as we have described. Numerous facts have been devised—ingenious but fanciful—for showing imaginary arrangements of channels and cavities in the rocks at a certain depth below the surface, so as to produce, by a combination of steam generators, air chambers, safety valves, and tortuous channels, which might be easily supposed to exist, and which, if they existed, would lead to the production of the phenomena in question. Of course these explanations are entirely conjectural; and, though it is well enough sometimes, when we can not determine how any given effect really is produced, to amuse ourselves with imagining ways by which it might be produced, we must not mistake such hypotheses for actual knowledge.

But, whatever we may make of the proposed explanations, there is no doubt that the Great Geyser of Iceland presents at the time of an eruption one of the most astonishing spectacles which nature ever where exhibits. The basin is surrounded by a mound of stone, which the water has itself formed, fifty to sixty feet in circumference and twenty high. The centre forms a well ten feet in diameter, through which, in the ordinary state of the Geyser, the water is seen to be boiling, rises quietly, and thence flows in a gentle stream over the margin of the mound, depositing sinter sometimes, sometimes for many hours, in this state, until at length a rumbling noise is heard deep under ground, and the water rises higher and higher into the air, until the rousing and steaming column finally shoots up to a height of from fifty to two hundred feet, according to the violence of the paroxysm. The water then, leaving basin nearly at the boiling point, the whole mass soon envelops itself in a cloud of steam which shuts the column of water almost entirely from view. The discharge continues for about five minutes, after which the Geyser returns to its normal condition of tranquillity.

The Great Geyser, so called, is not to-day excited to an eruption by throwing stones into it as another one situated at a few hundred feet distant from it, called the Strokr Geyser, from an Icelandic word signifying churn. The eruptions from the Great Strokr take place spontaneously two or three times a day; but by throwing stones into the opening they can be brought on almost at any time. Attempts have been made to sound these wells, but the plummet will only descend to the depth of from fifty to one hundred feet before coming to a stop. Whether the stoppage of the lead is occasioned by its reaching the bottom, or by some irregularity in the form or in the direction of the channel of communication, of course can not be known.

It is to be expected that a phenomenon so wonderful as that of these explosive fountains is to be seen only in a desert country, and that it is almost entirely withdrawn from observation from the whole human race. Three or four travelers in a century make their way over the rough volcanic rocks which guard them, and bring back to us their reports of the strange and unrepresentable scene. They can, however, do but little to give an adequate idea of the shocks the scene presents to the eye-witness, and still less can they explain the nature and the operation of the cause by which the effect is produced. There is no doubt that the force by which the water is ejected is that of steam, and that this steam results from the water deposited on the surface in rain, and thence percolating through fissures and crevices and passages until it reaches the incandescent, or nearly incandescent, regions below. But in what precise manner the steam thus produced is collected, and in what manner it is transmitted to the surface upon my word. 'So help me, God,' is what I have first to say, and then say that!"

Why not?" rejoined the other, stoutly. "Will not these men, too, call God to witness what they know to be a lie? Will not He discern the motive that prompts you—desire to see a wronged man righted, the innocent set free—and the motive that prompts those—malicious hate? Or do you deem the all-seeing eye of Heaven is purblind? I tell you this, girl, if I were in your place, and the man I loved stood justly in such peril, I would swear a score such oaths to set him free! Yet here, with justice on your side and truth, and Heaven's help, to the fore-rate: you shrink from uttering a mere form of words the spirit of which is contained in the letter, and for conscience sake, forsooth, will let your lover perish. Your lover! yes, but you were never his wife, although he thinks so, to his sorrow, and tell him that you refuse to speak the thing that alone can save him from the full force of wretchedness; I will go and tell him that the girl for whose sake he has brought this load of pain on himself will not so much as lift a finger to her little finger! You fair, foul devil, how I hate you!" Sine drew herself to her full height, and regarded the wretched girl with such contemptuous scorn that even in her abject misery she felt its pain.

"I have not entered your house," said Harry, with some degree of firmness, "till I have carried your scorn; not a sweet taste you have given me despite me, because I fear to anger God."

"And you," added the other, with a bitterness. "You fear your father's wrath far more than Heaven's."

That bolt went home: the unhappy girl did indeed stand in greater terror of her father than of the sin of perjury; and the dark cloud fell upon oath what she had but a few days before so solemnly denied to him was filling her with contentemnation and dismay. Still the struggle had not had just been drawn of the ruin that would assuredly befall her Richard, and she cried out that to save him, had more vivid colors even than that of Tavernhelm's anger. Let him kill her, if he would, after the trial was over, but Richard she should go free.

"I will do your bidding, madam," said she, suddenly, "though I perish, body and soul."

"You say that now, girl, and it's well and bravely said; but will you have courage to keep your words to proof? When I am gone, and there are none but Richard's foes about you, will you resist their menaces, their persuasions, their sophisms, and be true as steel?"

"I will, I will!" answered Harry, impassionately; "they shall never turn me from it. But suppose they prevent me from leaving Gerbin, from attending at the trial on the day?"

"Well thought of!" answered Mrs. Gilbert, approvingly; "that has some sense in it, after all, this girl. As for their forbidding you to give evidence, however, Mr. Wessel, who is Richard's lawyer, will see to that. You will be summoned as a witness for the defense. You will say, then, that it was you who opened the window and let out the notes, and gave them into Richard's hand."

"But how could I open the letter pullock?"

"Good, again!" answered the other; "you have asked the very question that should have brought the answer. Now, listen! Have you access to your father's watch at times when he does not wear it?"

"Yes; he does not always put it on—never on the day he goes to market, for instance. He comes back late, you see."

"Just so; and sometimes, perhaps, not often—rather often, very good. Then, you need opened that watch from curiosity, and saw a paper in its case with B N Z upon it. Those letters formed the secret by which the lock was opened. You tried it, just in fun at first, and found they did. Do you understand?"

"I do," said Harry.

"You will not forget, then, what you have to say: and when? I negotiate it?"

"There is no need," groaned Harry. "I shall remember it forever, in spite of myself; and on my death-bed most of all." With a wearied look on her wan face, and a heavy sigh, the young girl rose to go. "Good-night, madam. We need not speak of this again to-morrow, need we?"

Surely not, child. My mission here is done. The rain is falling still, and that will be a sufficient excuse for my departure. I had a sick headache to-night—remember that—but it will be better after a night's sleep."

"Do you sleep?" asked Harry, simply. "Ah me, I would that I could sleep!"

"Of course I do. Is it not necessary for Richard's sake that I should be well and strong? I could veen all night and fast all day, if I let my foolish heart have its own way. But I am enough to grieve at any time: one has only to think to do that. Sleep, child, sleep, and a sick of him as he will be when you have set him free; then wake to work his freedom. I will tell him that you will do so. Press your lips to mine, that I may carry their sweet impress back to him. One moment more. Do not get your reason by heart, lest they should doubt you; but hold by this one sentence, and never swerve from it: 'I gave Richard Yorke the note with my own hand.' That is the key which can alone unlock his prison-door. Good-night, good-night."

CHAPTER XXVI.

MR. ROBERT BALFOUR.

An author of sensitive organization has always a difficulty in treating the subject of prison life. If he avoids details, the critics will not accuse him of to delicacy, but to incompetence; if, on the other hand, he enters into them, he trudges the narrow of the public, and hint that this particular phase of human experience is his specialty—that he "ought to know," because he has been "through the mill" himself. This is not kind, of course; but the expression, "a little more than kin and less than kind," is exceedingly applicable to the critic in relation to his humble brother, the author. We will take a middle course, then, and exhibit only just so much of Cross Key as may be seen in a "first visit."

Twenty years ago the system of treatment of prisoners before trial was somewhat lax. Now, Hyde's jails was not so uniform as it now is. In some they were permitted few privileges not enjoyed by the convicts themselves; in others considerable difference was made between the two classes. The governor at Cross Key was known to the side of indulgence. Its inmates who were awaiting their trial were allowed to wear their own clothes; to write letters to their friends without supervision (though not without the supervision of at their own part); and to mingle together for some hours in a common room, where that unbroken silence which pervades all our modern jails, and is perhaps their most terrible feature, was not insisted upon. In this common room Richard Yorke was standing on the afternoon following his incarceration. The principal meal of the day had been just concluded, and himself and his fellow-guests were sitting moodily over their troubles. The platters, the block-tin knives, so rounded that the most determined self-destroyer could scarcely do himself with them into Hades, and the metal mugs had been cleared, and their owners, with the more genteel table were occupied by a few periodicals of a somewhat depressing character, though well adapted to the cultivation of quiet cheerfulness," and by a modest inkstand much too large to be available for any purpose, existing, in the ground, perhaps, of not needing the wings of liberty for any other purpose—were expected to furnish forth them their dinner. These were but half a dozen of these unfortunates; all, in ordinary circumstances, were the higher grades of the ordinary agricultural criminal. Ignorant, slouching, dogged, they might have fired a rick, or killed a keeper, or even shouldered but no thinking hooters—have shot a great man's pheasant. They had not yet lost the social privileges of conversation beyond a murdered word or two, but stared stupidly at the pictures in the magazines, wondering (as well they might) what the devolent faces of the landlords, clergymen, and all persons in authority therein portrayed, or perhaps not wondering at all, but in a state rather pondering whether Bet and the children had come from the Union to see them, and how much whether the man in the big wig would be hard upon themselves next Wednesday three weeks.

One of these two persons was, of course, our hero, who looked, by contrast with these hero, with his calm face and his clear eyes, like another world, a fallen angel, but with the evil forces of his new abode already gathering foot within him. His cropped hair had grown but ten times thirty; and the dusky glow of his dark eyes existed that expression of fierce pride which they did but ineffectually reflect the hell of hate that was beginning to be lit within him. It was natural the whole world of his fellow-creatures, so mad he was with pride and scorn and rage, but he had sought to benefit one of the benefit-ed, as theirs was now against him; his motto, like the crossed exclamation of the mob in the play, should be: "Fire, burn, kill. He was like a spoiled child who for the first time has received a severe punishment—for a wonder, and wholly undeserved—and who, nursing in his vengeful passion, that all mankind might have one mark in common with him, and therefore (forgetting he is no Hercules) his infant arms might throttle it off-hand. The love which he still felt for Harry on a small tinder on being brought into contact with a merchant prince. The sweet, gentle character of the "person" had invested this young man with an increased interest in the stranger's eye.

"That is a pretty gentleman," said he, admiringly; "and could scarcely have happened with a poor devil like me, but required to be born a gentleman to have such opportunities. Now, I don't mind telling you," here he rank his voice to a whisper, and looked cautiously about him, "that I was forty years of age before I ever got such a treat as this. I've done better since, but it's been up-hill work, for all that."

"It doesn't seem to have been very hard work," said Richard, with a meaning glance at the other's hand.

"Well, no, I can't say as it's been hard; at least touch is what is wanted in my profession."

"Why, you're not a pick—" Richard hesitated from motives of delicacy.

"A pickpocket? Well, I hope not, Sir, indeed," interrupted the other, indignantly.

Then what are you?" said Richard, bluntly.

As a ray maiden blushes and hangs her head in silence when asked the question which she is yet both proud and pleased to answer in the affirmative, so did Mr. Robert Balfour (for such was the name of our new acquaintance) pause and in graceful confusion rub his stubble chin with his left-hand, ere he replied: "Well, the fact is, I have been in the gold and precious stone line these thirty years, and never in the possession until this present summer, when I came down here, as a Yankee pal of mine once put it, 'to open a little branch.'"

"With a crowbar?" suggested Richard, with a faint smile.

"Just so," said the other, nodding; "and it so happened that yours truly, Bob Balfour, was caught in the very act."

"And what term of punishment do you expect for such a—"

"Such a misfortune as that?" answered Mr. Balfour, hastening to relieve Richard's embarrassment. "Well, I had got the worst, I should say—considering the testimonials that were handed in—have been a lifer. But since I did not realize so much as a weddin' ring, twenty years ought to see me through it now."

Twenty years!! Why, this man would be over seventy before he regained his liberty!

"Great Heaven!" cried Richard, "can you be cheerful with such a future before you? and at the end of it, to be turned old and penniless into the wide world!"

A genuine pity showed itself in the young man's look and tone. A minute before he had thought himself the most wretched of human beings; yet here was one whose fate was even harder, and who met it without repining. Community of trouble had already touched the heart which he had thought was turned to stone.

"Are you sorry for me, young gentleman," inquired the convict, in an altered voice, "you who have got so much trouble of your own to bear?"

"I am, indeed," said Richard, frankly.

"You would not write a letter for me, though, would you?" inquired the other, wistfully. "I should like to tell—somebody as I've left at home —where I am gone to: and the fact is, I can't write: I never learned how to do it."

Richard took over Bob Balfour's face for the first time; the man was ashamed of his ignorance, though most of his career of crime. "If it's too much trouble, say so," added he, gruffly. "Perhaps it was too great a favor to ask of a gentleman born."

"Not at all," said Richard, hastily, "if the writing will be to you any pleasure."

"Hush! the officer, if you please," said Balfour. "They like to be 'officered,' these gentry, every one of them. Some friend of mine always addresses em as 'dogs;' but that's a mistake, though not a bad one, mind you."

Mr. Robert Balfour spoke a few respectful words to the warder, and the requisite materials were soon laid on the table. Richard dipped his pen in the ink, and waited for directions.

"To cut a long story short, then," said Balfour, apologetically, "to my old mother. Perhaps you have a mother yourself, young gentleman?"

"I had one," he had written in somebody the previous day, before he left Plymouth, to tell her the same sad news which he was now, as he supposed, about to repeat for another, and to urge her to repair to Cross Key at once.

Mr. Balfour leant coolly on the table with his forefinger for a moment, and then, as though he had found the key-note of the desired composition, dictated as follows:

"My dear Mother,—When this comes to hand, I shall have took your advice, and started for the New World. There's a ship a-sailing from Plymouth in a day or two, and my passage in her is booked. I didn't like to come back to you empty, as I said I would when last in my mind, and turn to the old trade. The post is queer and doubtful, they tell me, in these far-away parts, but I shall have better luck, and perhaps have an opportunity. All as is mine is yours, remember: I leave it. I have no fear of mercy myself, for there's a place being key for me, out yonder, in the carpentering line. Hoping this finds you well, as it leaves me, Your affectionate son, ROBERT BALFOUR."

"Then you don't tell her any thing about what's happened to you?" said Richard, wonderingly.

"Why should I? The poor soul's over seventy, and will never see me again. It's a great deference in the two cases, an immense difference: but still he resented this exhibition of natural curiosity, and commenced folding up the letter in his own conduct.

The other, however, had no suspicion of this. His thoughts, just then, were far away; and the subject of them gave an unwonted softness to his tone as he said, "Richard!" "I thank you for this, kindly, young gentleman. Here's the address—East Street, Spitalfields. It's her own house: and she's well-to-do enough, and to spare, while she lives, thank the Lord! Well, this is much kinder, and if Bob Balfour can ever do a good turn for it, he will. Hello, you're wanted."

"Richard Yorke!" repeated the warder, loudly. "Let that you hear?"

Richard had heard well enough; but the idea of his name being called out in such a way as this had for the moment unmanned him; he well knew how proud she had been of it, and how much he honor her name, disgraced, disheartened, in prison, a regretted thief! But the next instant he reflected that her arrival could not be possibly looked for for some days; perhaps it was Trevethick, who had, in the mean time, himself come to his senses and his willingness to withdraw from the prosecution; perhaps Harry herself had relented.

But there was no time for further reconstruction; a second warder was at the door, with the impatient, and Richard rose at once. The dull faces of the rest were all raised toward him with a malign aspect; they feared that some good news was come for him, that they were about to lose a companion in misfortune. Only one held out his hand, with a "Good luck to you, young gentleman; though I never see you again, I shall not forget you."

"Silence there!" cried the officer in charge, as Richard passed out into the stone passage, which led to it across our ways better than this, Balfour."

SUMMONED TO THE WAR.

[See Illustration on Page 680.]

'Tis the Father-land that calls me, O my mother,
'Tis the Father-land that calls me, O my wife,
Calls me and many a sad-hearted brother
From the quiet hopes and labors of our life.

There are wives who pray with fervor that the battle
May spare the dearly loved ones, past all prayer;
And babes, too young a father's name to prattle,
Who will never know a father's tender care.

There are mothers who will shudder in the coming years;
There are friends, true friends, who will never meet;
There are homes where the ghost of haunting sorrow
Will sit forever in the warmest seat.

'Tis not our country wounds us, but the stranger—
We give but to our country what we owe.
For the rich invasion to us that toil of strangers,
Where the waters of our dear Rhine river flow.

And the very tree and shower of the nation,
The tilling and wood-whistles of the land,
The sturdy manhood of a generation,
In the vanward of the battle take their stand.

We fight for Father-land, and not for glory.
Where roots are watered by the tears of pain,
We fight not that our names should live in story,
But for the nation's life. And not in vain;

For 'tis a nation's war, and we, the nation,
Fight every inch of heart in our own cause,
Though the will of women, in their desolation,
Come to us only in the battle's pause.

Farewell, O mother! 'tis my father wants me—
Our country, common father of us all!
Farewell, O wife! weep not, for weeping daunts me;
Pray for me, and for yourselves I should fall.

SAILING UNDER FALSE COLORS.

It was in the year 1835, before Italian unity or independence was thought of, when the journey from Rome to Florence occupied two days and a half, and when the Grand Duke Leopold dwelt in regal magnificence in the Palazzo Pitti, that two young Englishmen sat at breakfast in a Florentine palace, in which, without very much crowding, might have been stored half a dozen of the "brown-stone fronts" of Fifth Avenue or Madison Square. But for the comparative discomfort of Fiesole and the cloud-capped spire of San Miniato on their very highest peak.

It was a scene to rouse the enthusiasm of any one who had lived long enough in the world to throw off the self-absorption and satiety of youth, which are the characteristics of extreme youth, and which, thanks to a merciful Providence, time rarely fails to modify and subdue.

Our young friends, who, by-the-way, were doing full justice to a most luxurious meal, were far too much interested in their plans for future enjoyment, and in discussing the animated speculations of mamma's bookwork which they had had in their yesterday's travels, than they were in the art treasures within, or the natural beauties outside the villa for where they had elected to spend the coming six weeks. The young men were old college friends, and had been traveling companions on the continent of Europe for nearly three years. In personal and mental attributes they were fairly matched; in worldly wealth and position widely apart. One was a nobleman, the elder a commoner, with land and broad acres, and a rent-roll that was counted by hundreds of thousands; the other had but an inheritance of three hundred pounds a year, and certain expectations from an estranged uncle. In short, one was William Addyboy, Earl Grafton, of Grafton Castle, Wilts, with minor estates in half the counties of England; the other was plain Roger Bertrand, of no family matched:

"It's a very dangerous experiment, my lord," said Mr. Bertrand, as he moved his head hand which served as presse-papier, and took out a dozen letters lying underneath. "The English in Florence are as 'thick as leaves in Vallombrosa,' and there are a hundred chances to one that you will be recognized by some one or other."

"What an old muff you are, Roger; and what do you mean by mi-lording me? How can I be recognized by people who have never seen me? Haven't I looked over the list of all the strangers in Florence, and there is not a name I know among them? Besides, am I not ready to sacrifice the silk-net beard and moustache in Tuscany, and appear before the world in the usual sad short, 'without decoration or adornment, a complete specimen of the true-born John Bull Briton (I beg your pardon, Merton), resting my hopes of success upon the qualities of heart and brain alone. Pass the cheese, old fellow, and hold your tongue while I look over these letters and make out the plan of our campaign. And you dove! what a thing it is to have a plan and a something before one, besides dawdling through picture-galleries, and being 'civil and kind to your lordship' by all the mewling, puling, mushy-pasty puff-hunters between here and Mayfair! Let me see—to 'the English Embassador,' to the 'Chamberlain of the Grand Duke,' introducing Lord Grafton and his friend Mr. Merton. Lucky I had your name included in my letters, Roger. Well—the whole thing is arranged in my mind, old fellow, and you're not to have a word to say. Only remember that you are Lord Grafton for the time being, and as you won't sail under false colors, and go out and have a good time among the managing mammas and the husband-hunting daughters—why, 'Lord Grafton' must be an invalid and a hypochondriac, and never be seen by any one but his valet and his attached friend 'Merton.'"

"Very well," replied Roger, as he shook the ashes from his meerschaum on to a small silver plate—"'a willful man, etc.,—you know the old saying, Grafton. But it does seem to me the most insane project that was ever set on foot. To be impelled to give in my, like a good fellow! To be expected to sin and woo the lovely girl we met at Valombrosa yesterday, do it without subterfuge or deception. Let her know who I am, who and what you are, and trust—"

"To the noble indifference of the blood and power that exists in the female mind," interrupted the young lord. "No, I thank you, Roger; there's an amount of self-sacrifice about you, old boy, that would get the better of me on any other point, but on this my mind is made up. I have come to get such a notion again, and I'm resolved to be plain Mr. Merton for the next six weeks, and see what I can do toward remaking Grafton's hearts without my title and estates to back me."

"And so enact the 'Lord of the Manor' without any overdrive and humiliation, most likely. Recollect I warned you, Grafton," replied Merton, shaking his head gravely at his titled friend. "But if it is to be, when is the masquerading to begin, and how soon am I to fall into invisible ways? I don't feel any premonitory symptoms, unfortunately, and you must have nobody grumpy as a mask-ball companion. If you do I must pass for a lunatic, not for an invalid, this air gives me such a capital appetite. Do I'll let me get a glimpse of the Venus to-day, I hope, before I succeed to my unwelcome title, and am shut up in the mausoleum of—"

"Certainly, old fellow; do whatever you like. I shall be all the morning under Francois's manipulations, trying to be made respectable and invisible-like. And perhaps you may as well, as they spoke, and setting their hats upon their heads after the most approved British style, the young men left the room by different doors.

II.

There was a ball at the grand ducal palace a few days after the conversation recorded in our first chapter, and the whole of Florence, the whole free of cavaliers, and in the glitter of uniforms, stars, and diadems, "plied with Mercury," made his bow to Florentine society. After the necessary presentations to the court circle, and after bearing with the most profound regret expressed at the declining health of his noble friend, the soi-disant Mr. Merton found himself sufficiently disengaged this beginning of the season very much unknown and unnoticed, and rather uncertain whether this condition was one of pleasure and attractions were not somewhat of a mistake after all. He stopped for a moment in the hall-room to watch a pas-de-deux in which the Grand Duke himself was dancing, and as his eye fell upon the figure of the lovely Valombrosa, a thrill of delighted surprise ran through his frame, for he recognized instantly his charming exposition more of Valombrosa than of Florence, as the adventure there. She was a young English girl of about eighteen years of age, simple and very fair, and with the timidity of her race and of her sex written in very line of her beautiful face. She was dressed in white muslin, with no other unusual length, seemed to elude the most cautious attempts to meet their admirers' eyes, wore her hair purely parted over the small regular teeth, even in response to the efforts of her illustrious partner to attract her. She danced with the ease and grace of a Frenchwoman, gliding over the smoothly waxed floor without effort, and without seeming or desiring a fold of the exquisite Parisian elaboration which was called then, as it is called now, the "toilette de bal." And Grafton was too well accustomed to the "coming, seeing, and conquering" process to have any misgivings for the success of lord chamberlains, and requesting an introduction to the unknown beauty and to the honorable and worthy cursed his own folly in assuming a name and rank which were not his own when he saw the Duke's chamberlain bowing and smiling before complying with his request.

The quadrille ended, however, and the young lady deposited at the side of a rather formidable looking chaperon, whom Grafton devoutly prayed might not be her mother. "Mr. Merton" was taken up and presented to "Miss Adelaide Berringer." The young ladies were raised for a moment, and then Mr. Merton was called upon to make a second bow to "Mrs. Berringer," which he did with one of the most self-conscious phrases which completely took away that lady's breath. She, however, recovered herself as quite as apparent as was at all necessary that she was by no means pleased to make "Mr. Merton" the acquaintance of her daughter. The next waltz was timidly granted, and the next moment Miss Adelaide Berringer was whirling round and round the ball-room to the delicious music of the Duke's own band. A turn in the conservatory followed, and then a short conversation of having lost his way in his well-meaning efforts to find his fair partner, and Mrs. Berringer, Grafton led her out on to the moonlit terrace, where the entrancing beauty of the night was an excuse for still further delay.

During all this time Grafton had made the most of his extraordinary position, and with unusual conversational powers, talking charmingly and sympathetically, as he knew so well how to do, and eliciting many a responsive glance from under the long eyelashes.

"I think we had better go back now, Mr. Merton," said the young girl at last. "My aunt will be surprised at my long absence."

"Your aunt?" gasped Grafton. "She! the lady to whom I had the honor of being presented is not your mamma, then?"

"Oh no!" replied the fair girl, whose timidity was beginning to wear off a little. "I am an orphan. My aunt is very kind; but she has two daughters of her own."

"To whom I was not introduced," interrupted Grafton, quickly.

"Oh no! nobody ever is introduced to Mildred and Annie except lords or honorable ministers," replied Adelaide, with great naivete', "but I'm only a poor little girl, without parents or fortune, and when we go home very likely I shall fulfill a destiny as governess."

"Governess!" exclaimed Lord Grafton, looking compassionately down upon the lovely countenance at his side. "You are very unfit for that, my child."

"Oh, indeed," replied Adelaide, simply, "I have been very carefully educated, I assure you. I speak French and German as well as I do English, and pronounce that I sing very nicely."

"Sing!" exclaimed Lord Grafton, "how delightful! I am so fond of music! When may I have the honor of hearing you? Perhaps we might manage a duet together. I have a pretty fair tenor myself—"

"I am sure I shall be very happy," replied Adelaide, looking shyly down; "but, indeed, we must go in now. My aunt will think it so very strange."

And resisting all his efforts to detain her, she turned resolutely toward the entrance of the palaces.

They were met in the grand corridor by Mrs. Berringer and her two very plain daughters, attended and chaperoned by a stout and very stern was the glance the good lady bent upon "Mr. Merton" and her beautiful niece as they approached. All the more reason for their long absence.

"Mildred has your cloak, Adelaide," she said, in a tone that was intended to be calm; "and Lord Loftus will see us to our carriage. I have the honor of wishing you good-evening, Sir," she continued, addressing profoundly to "Mr. Merton," with an emphasis which seemed to this unfortunate young gentleman to mean on this occasion, but for the remainder of his natural life.

For the next few weeks life seemed to be one long summer day's holiday to Lord Grafton, and one long day's winter of discontent to the assumed possessor of that ancient name. In direct opposition to his friend's judgment and advice, Grafton gave himself up entirely to his daily increasing passion for Adelaide Berringer, and was well aware that the unconsciously betrayed it himself which she unconsciously betrayed. At balls and fêtes, in gardens and drives, they met continually, and Grafton had even the temerity to snap his fingers at Mrs. Berringer's repelling coldness, and still frequent that society which, even in the great morning after morning listening to the delicious strains of Adelaide Berringer's voice. During all this time he had not been honored with an introduction to the Misses Berringer, nor once received the slightest sign of recognition from them. It seemed to be tacitly admitted that he was "still enough" in the favor of Adelaide's, and would be tolerated as such provided he made not the slightest attempt to invade the sacred precincts of the nursery circle. As for Adelaide herself, she was living in an enchanted land, in which she and Grafton were the sole inhabitants. To her guileless nature the good things of this life were comprised within very narrow limits. To walk with the deep blue skies, gardens and vineyards under the deep blue sky of Tuscany—to dance with him, sing for him, and to fight nobly and bravely for him against the scoffs and sneers of the whole home circle, was happiness enough for her. The rest she left to him, "secure," as she shyly told him, when they stood together on the very spot where he had first seen her, in the valley of Valombrosa—"secure in his love, and content to give up all the future life to him."

And then Grafton would press her to his heart in a wild ecstasy of happiness, and whisper, "My darling, my love, dearest, of the trials and privations that poverty and obscurity may bring, I am ready for them. In the battle of life, fierce and dark though the struggle may be, at my side?" He had his answer in language that is ever the same, but not very intelligible to those living outside of their enchanted circle.

III.

"Isn't it time for this farce to come to an end, Grafton?" said Roger Merton, in a disconsolate tone, as he watched his friend pacing the terrace below the villa toilet for a "dress" in the lovely grounds of the Cascine. "I've been ill with fever, I've been a prisoner to my bed, and sooner you publish my demise the better."

"My dear fellow, don't talk of dying," replied Grafton, "for I shall be put out of your misery without going through that uncomfortable process. But you have been very much to blame for your patience and long-suffering in my cause. And by Jove! Roger, what a splendid success our little deception has been! I never should have believed that girl loved me for myself alone but for the fact that circumstances have put me upon my word, Merton, a man can't talk about that sort of thing, you know, but I do believe that I am the most self-pitied couple in Europe. The only trouble is how to break the truth to her. Do you think you'd like me much if I told you my title and estates?"

"Have you got her suit's consent to 'plain Mr. Merton' entering her august family?

"Oh, such a lark! Yes, the old lady was pleased to accord her royal permission, upon condition that our names were to be struck off her visiting list from the hour of our marriage. I've played you fairly, old boy, and by Jove! I'll hold to her own conditions strictly. How I did enjoy dwelling upon my narrow income in the only conversation I have ever had the honor of holding with her! By-the-way, Roger, I wish you'd go in and court one of those old girls as Lord Grafton. It would be such a splendid 'plant' upon the old dame."

"Thank you," replied Merton, dryly. "If you can offer me no better compensation for my services, I prefer to remain forever unremunerated. But, joking apart, Grafton, have you taken my advice and consulted Lord and Lady N—— about the marriage, and the best way to get out of this awkward affair?"

"Made a clean breast of it yesterday, Roger. The ambassador looked rather grave at first, and said something about the reproach cast upon 'our order' by my little escapade. What a farce it all is, to be sure! Fifty years hence 'our order' will probably have ceased to exist. But never mind, the old lady made it all right. Her plain old heart was charmed with the romance of the thing, and it's settled that our marriage is to take place at the embassy early next month, and they'll undertake to break the 'dreadful intelligence' to Mrs. Berringer, after we're gone, I suppose."

"When the veritable Roger Merton will throw up his cap and shout, 'Hurrah for liberty!' I never knew how fond I was of my father's name until I lost it. Can't I have it back before the wedding-day?"

"Not one hour sooner, you poor old victim. You've a great mind not to give it to me at all. It has brought me more happiness than ever my title and estates did—long may they!" and catching up his gloves and stick, and wearing a laughing adieu to Merton, he ran gayly down stairs.

The fashionable world of Florence was full of the most anxious speculations as to the various excitement and astonishment which was to herald the marriage of Adelaide Berringer with "that plain Mr. Merton, my dear," was to be celebrated at the British embassy; and faces was the struggle for invitations to the fête which Lord N—— had announced was to be given in honor of the occasion. What added a little to the interest was a certain veil of mystery which seemed to hang over the affair, from the impossibility of ascertaining definitely what the arrangements for the marriage were to be. All that the most assiduous artifices of fashion could learn was contained in their cards of invitation, which summoned them to the grand chapel of the embassy at one o'clock, and to an outdoor fête with dancing, to commence immediately afterward.

The sun shone as it can shine nowhere else but in an Italian sky on the memorable day which was to be a "red-letter day; and deep was the murmur of admiration that ran round the crowded chapel as, leaning on the arm of Roger Merton, he led up the aisle leaning on the ambassador's arm. The bridegroom met her at the altar; and when, a few minutes later than one of those present that the look of tender affection which rested for a moment on the lovely bride changed to one of almost triumphant defiance as he glanced round the assembled crowd. The ceremony proceeded, and at the first pause of the service the words were pronounced by the clergyman in that most solemn of all tones—the marriage service—"Wilt thou, be contains, Mildred Berringer whispered to the lady next to her, "William Adolphus?" What a grand name and such a very stupid husband! It ought to be 'Tom or Dick.'"

"Well," replied the lively girl to whom the remark was addressed, as the ceremony ended and the newly married couple, with their chosen witnesses, moved toward the vestry-room, "whether Tom, Dick, or Harry, he is a very distinguished-looking man. Adelaide Berringer is a lucky woman, I feel sure."

At this moment there was a buzz and a rustling through the chapel, and a signal from Lady N—— the guests retired and dispersed themselves over the magnificent grounds, or reclined in the luxurious carriages. Mrs. Berringer and her daughters took refuge in Lady N——'s boudoir. It having been a part of Mrs. Berringer's tactics from the first to identify herself as little as possible in the details of her niece's marriage, she had declined to accept the responsibility with her wife the signing of the contract. Now, however, she began to be a little anxious, and to wonder what had become of the bridal party. "Mr. nor Mrs. Merton," as she was careful to call them, had appeared.

"Do you think my little girl can have persuaded to Adelaide?" she said, a little nervously, to her eldest daughter. "Perhaps they have lost their way. Shall I go back to the chapel and make inquiries?"

"No, no, mamma," replied the aristocratic Mildred, who was standing near the window; "that horrid man is sure to be with them. I see Lord Grafton coming. Just come here a moment and look at this magnificent chariot standing at the embassy door. Ah and's coming out and four horses! It can not be Lord N——'s!"

"No," replied Mrs. Berringer, perceiving curiosity written on the blinds. "I have never seen it in Florence before. An earl's coronet—let me see. I have, Mildred. It must be that mysterious Lord Grafton's, whom nobody has ever seen. He has lent it to his friend for the first time in his life, knowing this, I suppose, girls, there are the bride and bridegroom getting in at this moment. They are going in their own carriage. Very sensible and judicious of them. I must say; as, of course, none of those people will ever call on a bride who goes in a hack. I did not suppose that Mr. Merton had so much tact. It spares us so much; my dears. Well, Adelaide goes off with flying colors," she continued, as the magnificent equipage dashed by, and the radiant face of Adelaide was visible for a moment to the group at the window—"it's a pity they are false ones."

"Hang me, madam," said Lord N——, who entered the room at that moment, and heard the last observation of his wife's guests, "if the true eyes of your lovely niece's own heart. And I am requested by the young Earl and Countess, whom you have just seen drive from my door, to apologize to their friends for their abrupt and unceremonious departure, and to say that they hope to meet, during the coming season in London, all those from whom they have received kindness and attention here. Those who have declined the honor of 'Mr. Merton's acquaintance,' he added, glancing slyly at Mildred and Annie, "will of course not have it forced upon them by Lord Grafton. To you, madam," he continued, turning to Mrs. Berringer, "I have begged to intrust me to present his grateful acknowledgments for the wife whom you so reluctantly bestowed, and to assure you that the confidence which you imposed upon him when you gave your consent to his engagement shall be most religiously observed. Will you allow me to conduct you into the banqueting-hall, madam," continued the courtly old gentleman, feeling ready now for Mrs. Berringer, whose face was pale to absolute ghastliness, "where you can take some refreshment, and receive the congratulations of our friends on the happy denouement of this romantic little drama?" You will find there also, madam, Lady N——'s chaperonage, the real Mr. Merton, to whose assistance in planning and carrying out this little plot Lord Grafton is largely indebted. He really is a most charming young man, and I am sure you will be delighted to make his acquaintance. As he is quite a stranger in Florentine society, I will take the liberty of presenting him to your daughters. I have the honor to offer you my arm, madam."

STRASBOURG UNDER FIRE.

On page 681 we give an interesting sketch of the city of Strasbourg and the various scenes during the recent bombardment. The sketch was taken from the heights near Appenweyer, in the Baden mountains, directly opposite Strasbourg, on the west bank of the Rhine, and overlooking the valley of that river, with the village of Kehl on the east side. The winding stream of the Ill and its canals may be traced through the flat alluvial ground the belaguered city, and behind it lies the plain of Alsace, and in the distant background rises the chain of the Vosges Mountains. The magnificent Cathedral, which fortunately escaped destruction, though much shattered by the bombardment, forms a prominent feature in this sketch. An official examination of the city after the capitulation showed that the Prussian fire had been terribly destructive. Entire streets were in ruins, and presented a picture of utter desolation.

VOLCANIC ERUPTIONS.

AMONG the still active volcanoes we meet with some whose craters are several miles in diameter, encircled by precipitous sides rising to even a thousand feet above the bottom of the crater, when at rest, which, as in the Sandwich Islands, may contain swampy, or rather lake-like hollows, two to four miles across, and at times send forth rivers of molten stone several miles in breadth, which, after fiery tumultuous course a distance of even forty miles from the crater whence they issued, in the eruption of Mount Etna, in 1865, a lava current, after reaching the coast, poured out such volumes of melted matter as to fill up a bay some twenty miles wide, and in its place extend a headland some three or four miles farther into the sea. The rate at which these rivers of molten stone flow is a very varying one; in 1805 the lava current from Vesuvius is said to have run down the first three miles in four minutes, yet only completed its total distance of six miles in three hours; and in 1843 that from Mauna Loa advanced no more than eighteen miles in two hours; while on the other hand it is recorded that during the eruption of Etna, which commenced in 1614, and continued many years, the lava stream only completed a distance of six miles in ten years, notwithstanding that all this time it was seen to be in slow but almost imperceptible motion; during the eruption of this volcano in 1865 it was found, however, that at the edge of the current the rate of motion varied from 15 to 150 feet per hour, according to local circumstances; in the centre of the stream the lava was evidently still more rapid in its movements.

The entire mass of a lava stream often endures even when to the eye it would seem to have become quite solid; upon throwing a heavy stone on to the top of a lava current so far consolidated that the stone merely dinted itself into the surface without sinking deeper, it was seen that the stone moved along with the lava, which otherwise looked as if stationary. The surface of this lava consolidated and cooled with almost incredible rapidity, so much so that, notwithstanding the protestations of his guides, a gentleman walked over lava currents when, at the same time, the fiery stream still flowing below could be distinctly seen through the cracks in the crust over which he passed.

On this occasion also the stems of the pine-trees in the forest which was destroyed by the eruption were converted into charcoal as high as the lava reached, but the upper portions of the trees then toppled over, and remained in all almost unaltered and uncharred condition on the top of the lava current which had so quickly cooled. The crust which forms on the top of lava when cooling, being an excellent non-conductor, acts so efficiently in preventing further escape of heat that we find streams of lava requiring many years, and even ages, to become quite cold. Dolomieu relates that the lower part of the Ischia lava of 1301 was still hot in the year 1785.

The buried cities of Stabia, Herculaneum, and Pompeii, covered up in parts to the depth of 100 feet by the ashes of Vesuvius, are ocular proofs of the vast quantity which can be sent out of a volcanic vent during an eruption. The volcano of Sangay, in Ecuador, in constant activity since 1728, has buried the country around it to a depth of 400 feet under its ashes; and a French geologist has estimated that in the course of only two days the volcano of Bourbon has thrown out no less than 300,000 tons of volcanic matter. The immense distances to which these may be transported by the winds is no less surprising; the ashes of Vesuvius, in the eruption which buried Pompeii, darkened the sun at Rome, and were carried as far as Syria and Egypt. Ashes from San Vincent, in 1812, are reported to have made the sky as dark as night in the Barbadoes; and at Iceland, in 1783, ashes and lava in charges with ashes for a distance of 150 miles around Hecla that several nights together night not be distinguished at a few yards.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

FOR the first time since theatres were permanently established in Paris there is a complete cessation of dramatic performances. These entertainments were stopped by legal authority; yet, before that was done, the managers announced their being about to close. While the Revolution was progressing, the tragedies of Marie Antoinette's favorite and Corneille were performed; and while the Reign of Terror deluged the streets of Paris with blood, sentimental dramas, recording the loves and quarrels of Corydon and Amoret, divided the public favor with republican lays celebrating the overthrow of the new religion, the marriage of priests, and other novelties. Napoleon went to the campaign which ended at Waterloo while the "Triomphe de Trajan" was being performed; and the entry for the second time of the Bourbons into Paris was celebrated by the production of "Le Roi et la Ligue." So that this peculiar feature of the present crisis must be considered in the serious aspect which it bears in the minds of the masses.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Saratoga, which was organized last winter, has had the largest gambling-saloon of John Morrissey. This establishment has been singularly and very successful, to the ruin of thousands, in defiance of all law. The statutes of the State authorize the seizure of gambling-tables and all property pertaining thereunto, and make it a punishable offense for any person to keep a gambling establishment. The promoter of the new association referred to was arrested, and, after examination, bound over to keep the peace and tried at the next term of the Saratoga County Court. All lovers of good order will rejoice to learn that the Young Men's Christian Association will persevere in this case until the notorious gambling-house is wholly routed out.

Remarkable solar phenomena are now exciting the interest of all astronomers. From observations made at the Allegheny University, Pennsylvania, it appears that the disk of the sun now furnishes what is covered with hundreds of spots of all sizes and in all positions. The area of one of the largest, through which is now near the centre of the disk, has been found by careful measurement to exceed in size 2,500,000,000 square miles. These spots apparently change their form from day to hour in a most unaccountable manner, sometimes to rush downward, carrying with it great masses of luminous matter to lower depths, and sometimes to burst asunder, and disappear entirely from the sight. Masses the size of whole continents are utterly changed in shape or disappear from one day to another. The appearance of the corona, which encircles during the whole "spot" in, to all appearance, being slowly absorbed by the cyclones which are visibly working there.

The aggregate number of persons who last year received relief from the public charities, under control of the Department of Charities and Corrections, or relief through their agency, is stated to be 94,878. Over 31,000 of these were relieved by the Superintendent of the Outdoor Poor.

The Chinese of North Adams continue to adhere to their peculiar diet of rats, on which they boarded at their own ate. They also eat beef and mutton, and occasionally vegetables. They are clearly in their personal habits, and are beginning to adopt the clothing which New Englanders generally wear. Some have ceased to have their heads shaved, which makes a vast change in their appearance; but the long queue is still carefully trained. They have not had any more raids, and many of them attend the churches and Sunday-schools. They work, however, very little with the exception, in general—which is, perhaps, one reason that they have still yet learned the smoke and drink. They are quiet and respectful, but withal somewhat suspicious; for when rumors have given them apples from their orchards they have been cautioned by Americans, who never have tasted the fruit until they have taken it home and examined it carefully.

A sect of Adventists, living in the vicinity of Pittsburg and Allegheny, are now busily circulating their belief that within the next two years the earth will be transformed into its original Edenic state. The European war, and the changes going on in the Papal States, are, in their opinion, fulfilling what the Seventh Day Adventists claim that the number of their followers in both Europe and America is large.

John Allen, who was unenviably known as the "Wickedest Man in New York," died a few weeks since. His father resided in West Perth, New York. At one time it was believed he had become a reformed man; but his subsequent conduct proved that the conversion was only a pretence for the hope of gain.

A correspondent of the Independance Belge, having visited Wiesbaden and seen the Emperor, says that he looks thirty years older than he did five years ago. He goes to bed late and rises early. A light can be seen burning in his bedroom after midnight, and between four and five o'clock in the morning he has already taken his first walk in the garden. Napoleon and his generals are apparently conscious of the tragic gravity of the situation, but his subaltern officers do not appear to understand it. They walk happily in the park, laughing at the passers-by, amusing themselves at the outside, and have all the insolence of jockeys accompanying a master on a journey of pleasure. One of these gentlemen dealed energetically, on the 8th of September, that the republic had been proclaimed at Paris. He considered it to be simply a Prussian ruse, and views told of the success of Paris of the first number of the Journal Officiel of the French republic, he shrugged his shoulders and said, with an air of superiority, "Good God, Sir, we must not believe every thing we read in the newspapers."

A singular petition was lately presented to the Board of Aldermen of Nevada City from a French woman who desired to be allowed to wear male attire. She stated that elsewhere she had worn those dress for twenty years, and being about to open a mercantile establishment in that city, she wished to be protected against insult in her new sphere. With her petition she sent a document bearing the signatures of the Clerk of the District Court of Amador County, California, which was giving her to serve as a protection against arrest, and which speaks of her as an industrious and virtuous woman, and one possessed of considerable real estate in that country. This document is certified to and countersigned by the French Consul at San Francisco, and states that she first adopted male attire in 1850, upon her arrival in California, that not finding any thing to do in San Francisco, and wishing to lead an honest and virtuous life, she went to work in the mines, where she made money enough to start in business.

A wild story is circulated in Paris that there exists a subterranean communication by wire entrance beyond the fortifications and another in Paris itself. The letter conveying this information to the authorities says that the writer has it from one of the masons employed in the work, who offers to come to Paris with a safe-conduct, but has a scruple. The subterranean passage is said to have been the work of six years, and to have been dug by German workmen on high pay, who were always taken to and from their work blindfolded!

The session of the British Scientific Association of Liverpool do not trouble their heads about the great war on the Continent, but have quietly assembled for the discussion of the "atomic theory," the size of Polyzoa, the expedition of Sir Samuel Baker, meteoric matcorn, fossil corals, and kindred matters. But in spite of their deliberations does not extend far out of their own charmed circle.

That much-dreaded disease, the yellow-fever, which has been prevailing in New Orleans and in parts of Texas, is, for the time, less than at the very door of our city during the past season. Although there is every reason to hope that the epidemic will not prove pernicious in regard to it, the season has now so far advanced that there is little danger of its becoming epidemic.

Phenaphthalosatrope is the name given to a new machine, invented by Dr. Donders, of Utrecht, for elucidating the movements of the eyeball.

A Massachusetts man having lately undergone a very severe surgical operation, his mind became unsettled, and he was seized with the conviction that they had removed all the internal organs from his body, and left him a mere animated shell. All their protestations to the contrary only convinced him the more of the perfidy of the whole medical profession. He would not eat, for he had no stomach; and forgot for nearly a month, he died the other day in a Salem hospital, bewailing his stolen vitals, and execrating his thievish doctors.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AN old lady, recently in search of a cook-stove which she was desirous of purchasing, when asked to take off her bonnet immediately refused to do so, saying, "I have to go here to compel a woman to take off her bonnet." "Oh!" unexpectedly replied one of the judges, "you know the law, do you? Perhaps you would like to come up and sit here and teach us?" "No, I thank you, Sir," said the old woman, tartly; "there are old women enough there now."

There are a good many people who do not live in New Jersey who will sympathize with the feelings of a Jerseyite, who, having found that sparrows would destroy mosquitoes as well as worms, procured a couple, put them into his bedroom, and told them to "skeer." He was somewhat discouraged when he returned to his room to find that the mosquitoes had swallowed the sparrows!

"I say, Pat, what are you about—sweeping out the room?" "No," answered Pat, "I'm sweeping out the dirt and leaving the room."

"Mother," said a little sharper the other day, "I know what I would do if I was at sea, and the men were all starving, and they should draw lots to see who should be killed and eaten, and it should be me—I'd jump into the water." "But," said the mother, "they would first tie you up." "No," said he, "for I wouldn't bite."

"Rose, I want twenty-five cents," said a jour printer recently to his employer. "Twenty-five cents! how soon do you want it, William?" "Next Tuesday week." "Then you shall have it." "I can't have it; I've told you often that when you were in want of any small change of money you must give me at least twenty dollars, for you ought to know that nobody pays the printer."

THE GREAT AMERICAN DESIDERATA—Fruit.

"It is a poor rule that won't work both ways," exclaimed the boy as he threw the furnie at the schoolmaster's head.

"What is the size of this place?" gravely asked a New Yorker of the landlord of a Western hotel. "Seven hundred and ninety-one!" said the landlord, with a look of surprise that was visible among the dying embers of a cigar which called an "outing-edition." "It's about as big as it ought to be," was the ready answer, "but it isn't built up yet."

Two Irishmen were one day engaged in rooting a house, when one of them lost hold and fell to the ground. The other hastened to him, and inquired when he found him lying prostrate and still, "Mickey? Mickey! are you dead?" "No, replied Mickey; "get out, but speakative!"

A St. Louis reporter is terrifically "graphic" in describing the recent collision of railroad trains in Missouri. Hear him: "The two engines rushed together with a terrific crash, and, mounting monsters, grappled like tremendous crab, reared over the track in a mortal wrestle, and fell into helpless and disjointed fragments on the ground."

A veteran was relating his exploits to a crowd of boys, and mentioned having been in five engagements. "Why, grandpa," said a little fellow; "my sister Sarah's been engaged eleven times."

BEAR HUNT IN A SOUTHERN CANE-BRAKE.—DRAWN BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 685.]

"OUR FRITZ" VISITING THE WOUNDED.

The kindness and consideration shown by the Germans to the French prisoners of war have been noted ever since the commencement of the conflict. At Berlin the citizens received the captives with open arms, and bundles of cigars and mugs of beer were distributed among them by the inhabitants of the various towns they passed through on the road.

The German officers also appear to be most anxious to alleviate as much as possible the lot of their unfortunate opponents. "Our Fritz" himself being among the foremost. The sketch on this page represents him speaking to wounded French soldiers as they were taken through the streets of Soultz the day after the battle of Wurth. An eye-witness, writing from the spot, describes his kindness as something wonderful, and tells us that whenever he sees a wounded man, whether soldier or officer, French or Prussian, he is sure to go up to him and say a few kind words.

JULES FAVRE.

We give on this page a portrait of M. Jules Favre, who is now the virtual head of the civil government of France, so far as such a thing can be said to exist in that country. He is a man of eminent ability and enlightened views. The task before him is, perhaps, the most difficult ever assumed by a statesman, and the prospect of a successful issue is very dim. His late circular, addressed to foreign powers, was the most reasonable and honest which has issued from any French Minister of recent times. Discarding the conventional fallacies of French rhetoric, he founds his arguments for peace on a basis which neutral governments generally recognized as reasonable, although it failed to satisfy the victorious enemy. Instead of insisting on the distinction between the imperial government and the nation, he candidly admits the obligation of France to repair by just measures the wrong it has done. If Germany "takes advantage of our misfortunes to overwhelm us, we shall offer a desperate resistance, and it will remain well understood that it is the nation, properly represented in a freely elected assembly, that this power wishes to destroy." It may, of course, be objected on the German side that the question is whether France is prepared to offer sufficient reparation; but it is impossible in an appeal to European opinion to enter into the details which must at some time be the subject-matter of negotiations. It is admitted that the French Foreign Minister has confined himself, in this circular, to arguments which serious and educated men may use without intellectual degradation, leaving it for M. Victor Hugo, who formerly encouraged the cupidity of his countrymen for the Rhine, to rout in inflated phrases about Leonidas, Rienzi, and Danton, Plutarch, Homer, and Nebuchadnezzar.

JULES FAVRE.

IN A CANE-BRAKE.

The cane-brake is a distinguishing feature in Southern lowland scenery. Along the Mississippi and its tributary rivers and bayous there are large tracts of land periodically submerged, and covered by dense thickets of the graceful cane, affording cover for large numbers of reptiles and other wild animals. Trumpet-vines, wild convolvulus, the passion-flower, and other climbing and twining plants, lend the canes with their luxurious growth, and make them gorgeous with color. Over all the Spanish moss, which in such situations flourishes exceedingly, hangs from the dying cypress-trees, or swings from limb to limb in giant festoons. Malaria here holds potent sway, and woe to any one, not "to the manner born," who may have to pass a night in these deadly fastnesses.

In these swamps runaway negroes were wont to hide themselves from their masters, and during the war scouts and guerrilla parties found ample cover in these close retreats. A gentleman who visited a Confederate command in one of these thickets describes it as well quartered in an immense lodge, built of the canes, with doors and numerous windows. The brake had been leveled for many rods around, forming a dry and compact flooring, and every precaution had been made to avoid surprise.

Our picture on page 684 represents the capture of a bear, which, having been too particular in his visits to a neighboring plantation, had contracted the ill-will of the owner, and was hunted down by a detachment of the hands detailed for the purpose. These packed the festive Bruin to his lair in the dense cane-brake, and there, with the aid of all the dogs in the vicinity, surrounded his beurship, and put an end to his marauding.

ELGIN (ILLINOIS) Watches!

ILLINOIS STATE NATURAL HISTORY SOCIETY,
BLOOMINGTON, ILL., June 29, 1870.

T. M. AVERY,
Prest of the National Watch Co:

Dear Sir.—Last year, in the explorations of the canons of the Colorado River, I had unusual opportunity to test the accuracy of one of your watches. I was provided with four pocket chronometers for use in astronomical observations. I also had with me an "Elgin" watch, which I rated from time to time, independently of the chronometers, by observations for meridian. Of the five instruments to rate was the second best. With the ordinary disturbance due to transportation, its rate was the least variable; while, with the extraordinary disturbance incident to such an expedition, it was the only instrument on which I could rely, the chronometers at last becoming useless. I am, with great respect, yours cordially,

JOHN TO JONATHAN.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES has been welcomed in this country as few Englishmen would be, and his addresses in Boston were as much by and simple sentiment of the feelings toward us and our late war of the Englishmen who were our friends. What Mr. HUGHES said does not materially differ from the speech of Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH at Ithaca last year, except that the latter claimed rather more good feeling upon the part of the chief members of the English ministry than Mr. HUGHES. But they both agree that the great popular feeling in England was strongly with us, and that the action of the Government, however hasty and negligent it may seem to us, was first taken on the instinct of English vessels, avow simultaneously with the issue of the President's blockade proclamation.

But the stress that we lay upon the Queen's neutrality proclamation is not so much upon the fact as upon the circumstances, as showing the spirit and temper of the British Government. It was the act of a cabinet which Mr. HUGHES is willing to admit was not friendly, and the declaration of neutrality of the cabinet, in the presence and offensive haste, indicated that the Government had prejudged the case against us—a fact which creates a presumption against its subsequent action. But it is certainly not fair to forget that the same ministry opposed in Parliament the issue of Governor EYRE and his friends at intervention, and declined absolutely the proposition of LOUIS NAPOLEON to the same end. The precipitancy, of unfriendliness in the issue of the Queen's proclamation is not susceptible of definite settlement. It will be determined by facts, but to every impartial mind it must still be an important consideration. Mr. SUMNER'S statements upon the subject were undoubtedly made without full knowledge or consideration of the facts, and we must be content upon both sides to have our own opinion. The English opinion is that the British cabinet thought that the Union would be destroyed, and were not very sorry, and acted accordingly.

Upon the scope of the Alabama Mr. HUGHES very wisely refrains from a general discussion, which could lead to no beneficial result. He was the first man in Parliament to urge upon arbitration upon the British Government. He concedes that that Government has acted unwisely in its policy as untenable; and in accepting the terms proposed by the United States, and in professing willingness to discuss the matter in public law which late events have suggested, he thinks that the British Government has done all that can honorably be asked. He distinctly agreed that when there is a serious difference between two nations, there are but two practicable methods of settlement—war and arbitration. But in this case the arbitration should interpret—that is to say, should make—international law upon the subject of recognition. Such a Government, according to British authority, is a fact, is it wise to leave the determination of the fact wholly to every state, or shall the great powers of Christendom agree upon certain preliminary conditions which should plainly exist? The vital international question is, Shall such precedents set by Great Britain during our war be accepted or condemned as a part of the code of nations? The question between America and England is, Will England pay for the losses inflicted by the privateers that escaped, or which were hospitably entertained? The last is all that we can demand as a nation; but the settlement of the first is essential to the restoration of friendly feeling between the two peoples.

"Shall it be love or hate, John?" asked Mr. HUGHES, quoting LOWELL; and to his earnest and noble appeal for mutual forbearance and intelligence every honorable American heart will unreservedly respond. Indeed, the great service of the pleasant and plain speech in this country of men like THOMAS HUGHES and GOLDWIN SMITH is the revelation that they make of the fact, which it is folly that any America understood, that there are two England—the England of aristocratic and narrow traditions, and the England of broad and generous intelligence and cosmopolitan sympathy. In the same sense, also, there are two American—the America of the traditions of caste and slavery, and hatred of race, and hostility to progress, and the America of liberty and justice and equal rights. During the war aristocratic England and aristocratic America—which was the rebel chiefs and their abettors—sympathized to the utmost, while the England of the people and the America of nationality, of freedom, and of equal rights, also clasped hands and hearts.

And now, in the interest of civilization and of human progress, it is the paramount duty of the last two not to relax their group. It is their duty to oppose every attempt to foster hostility and bitterness of feeling. It is their duty to remember that in settling the difficulties between the countries they are dealing with friends and not with foes, and to seek, therefore, not the humiliation of a rival power, but the clear and honorable and permanent adjustment of the two countries which lead the van of well-ordered civilization. This is possible only if undertaken in the spirit of the parting words of THOMAS HUGHES. "When that centenary comes round," he said, speaking of the 4th of July, 1876, "I hope, I trust, I believe, to see the great family of English-speaking nations girding the earth with a circle of free and happy communities, in which the mother shall be spoken of more on earth and good-will among men may not still be a mockery and a delusion."

IS GERMANY IMPLACABLE?

THE overthrow of France is so sudden and complete, the total destruction of a great and imposing military prestige is so astounding, that there is a natural disposition to accuse Germany of peculiar ferocity. Bismarck, personified in Bismarck, is depicted as unreasonable, insatiable, and blood-thirsty. It is declared to be devastating France, to be occupying towns and cities by arsenal, and to be threatening with fire the capital of civilization—the beautiful city. And this is urged against Germany as if she had deliberately refused the opportunity of making reasonable terms of peace and of ending the war. It is a calumny which we have already combated, but the accusation is so incessantly and vigorously urged that it is only fair to repeat the simple fact of the case.

When the empire fell by the surrender at Sedan, and a self-appointed committee of safety proclaimed the republic, M. JULES FAVRE, the Foreign Minister of the Committee, in his first circular denounced the King of Prussia for continuing the war, to which he had said that he waged against the Emperor, who was gone, and then added, that "a shameful peace" was not to be thought of, and that "France yields not one foot of soil, not a stone of a fortress." M. GAMBETTA, the Minister of the Interior, made a still more fiery declaration of a determination to expel the invader. M. RENATTE, the Prefect of Paris, said that the command was France "perpare to vanquish or die;" and the whole body of ministers called upon the country to rally around the glorious standard which eighty years before had driven all Europe before the victorious republic. All this certainly indicated a positive unwillingness to cut the country of the enemy; but it is quite as distinctly said to that enemy, "The terms you will probably offer us hereafter to advance as shameless."

But the Provisional Government, while hoping and, indeed, suggesting the mediation of foreign powers, was only made up of propositions of its own, but admitted that it was provisional merely, and that its action could not bind France. Meanwhile the German armies advanced upon Paris. What else could they do? The King had, indeed, said that he fought the Emperor, who was now his prisoner; but a nation and its military organization had supported the Emperor, and had made for their own ends. Germany, it was felt they did not say to the King, "This war was not our war; let us make peace." But they said, "We mean to make sure that you are ready, to drive you from our soil, and we don't mean to submit to a shameless peace."

There is not a government in the world that would not have done precisely what the Germans did. They pushed steadily forward. But they were plainly willing and anxious to encounter proposals for peace. There is no proof whatever of a cruel or blood-thirsty persistence upon their part. Indeed, M. FAVRE in his circuit reports, and most truly, that the situation permitted the enemy to throw upon France the responsibility of continuing the struggle. This is a distinct exculpation of Germany of any extraordinary hostile eagerness. And when M. FAVRE went out to negotiate, even with a prince, although M. BISMARCK showed that M. FAVRE could give no guarantee, which M. FAVRE admitted, the proposals for peace were made, M. FAVRE was conveyed through the German lines.

Unfortunately M. BISMARCK and M. FAVRE differ in their representation of some material points of the interview, which was abortive. The Provisional Government, M. FAVRE announced the conditions suggested by Prussia as "inolent pretensions;" declared that Paris was exasperated, and would fight to the last, self beneath her ruins." The German Government announced that an armistice being declined, the fate of Paris had become subject to military events. An armistice was, of course, the first condition of any negotiation. And for the necessary grave losses which the delay must inflict upon Prussia the surrender of Strasbourg, Toul, and Phalsbourg was demanded. It was not a severe demand, for they fell within a few days afterward, and the acceptance of the proposition would have saved much suffering. The conversation upon the terms that might subsequently be asked by Germany revealed the hope of acquiring Alsace and Lorraine by the right of conquest. This, certainly, is not an unprecedented nor unexpected demand, nor is it one of which FRANCE should too vehemently complain, since it is perfectly well known that if she had been victorious she also would have "exacted" from Prussia the return to us, however, a mistaken demand upon the part of Germany, for reasons that we have hitherto stated.

The whole situation, France, to gratify a grudge and to rectify a frontier, undertakes a ruseless war against Germany; and we say that whatever the opposition of THIERS upon the ground of want of readiness, there is no question that the war was sustained by the opinion of the country. Meeting reverses, the country apparently acquiesces in a change of government to prosecute the war with more energy. Unable to stay the enemy, France proposes to treat of peace, declaring in advance that it will not surrender an inch of territory nor a mile of a fortress. Germany, and certainly not unreasonably, insists upon its right to have the most substantial security against a similar assault from France, and declines what the security should be. France rejects the demand with disdain. To those to whom the demand of Prussia seems monstrous her conduct is, of course, rapacious and cruel. But that, under the circumstances, it is moderate or insolent we do not see, although it seems to us impolitic, because it does not promise peace.

Meanwhile the official report of the interview held with COUNT BISMARCK by M. JULES FAVRE, and which was published at length, will show clearly that there was nothing unkind nor insulting in the tone of the German offer, and that the strongest reasons were given for what seemed to the French the most dishonorable propositions. It must also be added that the Prussian terms appear to advantage in their own story. The war must proceed; but the passionate denunciation of the Germans because they put forward terms before an enemy who still resists is puerile. By the admitted laws of war which France has always recognized, victorious Prussia may properly demand territory as a condition of peace. It is for France to determine whether, in view of the general situation, the demand should be resisted at the cost of still farther bloodshed and inconceivable suffering, which to all reasonable apprehension would seem to be utterly fruitless.

STEWART L. WOODFORD.

GENERAL STEWART L. WOODFORD, whose portrait is a frontispiece page, is already well known in the State of New York, for in every part of it his eloquent and earnest voice has been heard pleading for the principles of the party which has now nominated him for Governor. Although still a young man, he has been a great deal of service of many kinds, and his tastes and his powers both incline him to a political career. He was born in the city of New York in 1835, and after graduating at Columbia College and studying law he was admitted to the bar. In 1860 a delegate in the Chicago convention that nominated MR. LINCOLN for the Presidency, he sustained the good cause throughout that exciting canvass in a series of able and popular speeches, taking rank immediately with the most effective orators of the party. He was selected to carry the electoral vote to Washington, and was soon after elected chairman of the Young Men's Republican Committee of the city.

Soon after MR. LINCOLN'S inauguration MR. WOODFORD was appointed Assistant-District-Attorney, and was placed in charge of the business for the prosecution of the many political captures made by the government; and we have the testimony of the District-Attorney, MR. DELAFIELD SMITH, which was warmly and generously given immediately upon General WOODFORD'S nomination at Saratoga, that MR. WOODFORD discharged his duties in this office with ardent and most satisfactory manner. The charges which have been made by heated partisan fear that his political fidelity have led him to suggest even a suspicion of MR. WOODFORD'S honorable regard for his duty. In 1862, after DELAFIELD SMITH'S honorable retreat, MR. WOODFORD enlisted for the war as a private soldier, and was promoted to be Lieutenant-Colonel before he joined the front. He served upon the Peninsula, and was afterward transferred to General GILMORE'S Southern Department. He commanded the brigade upon Morris Island, subsequently acted as Judge-Advocate-General of the department, and was intrusted with the exchange of prisoners. As General SHERMAN approached the coast Colonel WOODFORD sought more active service, and took part in several engagements.

When active hostilities ceased upon the Southern coast Colonel WOODFORD was made Provost-Marshal-General, and first Military Governor of Charleston. In this position his discretion, firmness, and ability were so conspicuous that he was called to be chief of staff by General GILMORE. Later Colonel WOODFORD succeeded General GROVER in command of the city of Savannah. During all his administration he was the most faithful friend of the freedmen, and his rule was confessedly sagacious and effective. In 1865 he resigned, and returned to resume in New York the practice of his profession. In the same year he declined the Republican nomination to the Court of Common Pleas; and in the autumn of 1866, after a thorough and active personal canvass of the State, General WOODFORD was elected Lieutenant-Governor by a majority of fifteen thousand votes. Against his official career only one serious charge has been made by party malice or a charge intimately exposed and refuted.

This is the simple story of the patriotic and spotless public career of General WOODFORD, whose name of the most representative Republican Conventions ever assembled in New York has called to bear the party banner in the present contest. Never was engaged, under the most favorable auspices, in canvassing the State, and has invited his opponent to meet him before the people. That opponent, however, although willing to insult General WOODFORD, as he does in his reply, declines to meet him. But with a firm assurance of victory and hearty support, and with a wise effort upon the part of the city Republicans to cast their vote in the manner which the Tammany Ring least desires, with the inspiration of the autumn elections, and with the old Republican resolution in the quieter determination of the New York men who, its real political sympathy by the election of General WOODFORD.

THE AUTUMN ELECTIONS.

It would take a very powerful microscope to discover the enormous Democratic gains which the October elections were to reveal. Indeed, those elections would be a very remarkable Republican tenacity, for it is precisely in the elections of the second year of an Administration that its party strength seems to be usually at the lowest ebb. Differences and disgusts may then be indulged without too serious consequences. But such causes of reaction seem to have been singularly inoperative in the Republican ranks. No Administration was ever more caustically opposed by the enemies or more bitterly and plainly criticised by its friends than that of General GRANT. But the fact revealed by the elections is not that of the most patient, to every friend of the popular system, for it is that the conviction in the public mind that the Administration is honest and faithful is a prospect fortification. The autumn elections are the distinct declaration of the people that the President and his cabinet must be kept. They do not always do the wisest thing, perhaps, nor always appoint the best man, but they have the honor and real welfare of the country at heart, and therefore they can be trusted.

This is a verdict which must be especially grateful to the President, who came to his office with no particular familiarity with politics or politicians, but with a very sincere resolution to provide as far as he could economical and able public affairs. How honest and economical it has thus far been is shown by nothing more than by the readiness and eagerness of even which the Republican orators and papers turn to the financial condition of the country, proving by the analysis and most statistical method that the public revenues have been faithfully collected and sagaciously expended, while the heavy burden of taxation has been very largely lifted. An Administration which has steadily diminished the debt while it has reduced taxation to provide at the most economical rates, if its attitude at home and abroad has also been honorable and dignified. Indeed, a very serious consideration in the election of this year might have been anticipated without implying a vital distrust of the Administration. The organization of the party, and of which we have spoken, with the reaction of feeling that must, of course, follow the act supplement of reconstruction, the weight of unpopular taxes, which were sure to be emphasized by Democratic misrepresentation, and differences as to financial systems and measures, might have been expected to reduce very largely the Administration vote, and the actual result of the autumn and especially in all the more agreeable.

But we do not forget the other reason which will long continue the Republican ascendency in the country, and that is the profound national distrust of a party which has plainly revealed the quality both of its patriotism and its honesty. The people know that the Democratic party to-day is substantially the same as when it polluted ourselves rebellion and shielded its publish as shamefully corrupt. The autumn elections are the beginning of the answer to these questions.

They who have counted upon a rapid dissolution of parties are evidently mistaken. Existing parties can not be dissolved until there is a general conviction that the permanent issues are changed, and the error of some Republicans whose hearts are set upon certain measures and reforms is that in their eagerness they accept a formal and doctrinal view of the situation. If the only question of importance, for instance, were the method of reunion, the parties might fall to pieces. But the very fact of their steady cohesion should suggest that in the public mind there are questions even more important. And this general conviction will increase rather than decline. The real cause of the unfriendly party organizations is, that the old issues are not only not renounced by the Democracy, but they are constantly reaffirmed. The chief point in those issues is the amendments and the new colored vote. The elections show that that vote is, as it should be, a vote for the Republican party. But the fact will not win the Democratic party to acquiescence in the validity of the amendments, but will only embitter its hostility. To insist that the whole subject of reconstruction, therefore, is a settled issue is to accept a theory for a fact. The country has not done so, and the country is right.

Now let us put New York, where it belongs, in the Republican column of equality and progress, and we shall show the enemy at the polls, as we used to show him in the field, that our intention is to fight it out upon the line of his unconditional surrender.

ROBERT E. LEE.

ROBERT E. LEE was undoubtedly an amiable man and a good soldier. But his career, in that part of it which concerns the whole country, was the assertion of an apparently fatal weakness of character. He was bred in the army, and served as an engineer in Mexico with great distinction, and subsequently in a cavalry command. Upon the fall of Sumter, the first time that the flag of his country has been fired upon with doubtful result, he resigned his commission, on the 20th of April, 1861, saying that except in defense of his native State he had never sought to draw his sword. Despite this hope, however, he went immediately to Richmond, where, two days afterward, he was appointed General of the Virginia troops, and on the 10th of May Major-General of the rebel army. From that time he was the most popular leader of the Confederacy. He was passionately extolled by his Southern associates and the Copperhead papers in the North were never weary of applauding the "great captain" and "the Christian gentleman."

His military skill was conceded by his ablest opponents. He kept himself entirely aloof from politics, confining himself closely to his military duties, it will not, however, be forgotten that the failure of the Union prisoners at Belle Isle was almost visible from his headquarters in Richmond, and that the tortures of Andersonville were not stopped by him, not so far as we are aware, condemned. Personally courteous, and in the field honorably considerate of rebel and foe, his indifference to the fate of the Union prisoners may have been due to incredulity, or to a feeling that he was not responsible. Indeed, notwithstanding that he passed immediately into the national army to that of the rebels, his interest in the rebellion seems to have been reluctant and pro forma. Trained in the sophistry of State sovereignty he thought it his duty "to go with his State," but was not sure that his State was right. His services being required by the authority of which he thought them due, he performed the tasks allotted to him well as he could. "I recognize no necessity for this state of things," he wrote, and with a fatal inability to perceive what he yet seems always to have vaguely felt, the consequent immorality of his position, he continued to conduct the operations of a war which seemed to him needless.

If that war had been in defense of his country, if it had been a rising against intolerable oppression, if its object had been to convert and maintain threatened freedom, his obedience to such an authority would have been commendable. But it was a war to destroy the country, and instead of a rising against oppression, it was an effort to overthrow a great government, solely because it seemed to favor lawful liberty. To such a cause he gave his sword, because he thought that Virginia had a right to commence it. Was his moral judgment, upon that method, subject to his State? A man may be amiable, courteous, and refined, a brave and skilful soldier, intellectual, and learned, but if in the crucial moment of his life he consents to fight in a war of which he sees no necessity, and the malign purpose of which is but too plain, he consents to cloud his name forever as that of an amiable man whose weakness is virtual crime. It is in vain that we say General LEE thought that he ought to go with his State, for no man whom history can respect thinks that he ought to go with his State or with his country for an ignoble purpose. If he did not see that purpose to be ignoble, his confusion is only the more evident; for he was then ignorant of what was known to every man, and of what had been loudly and widely declared by the second officer of the Government which he obeyed.

From the day that he surrendered, and his cause was lost General LEE lived quietly withdrawn from the public eye. Apparently regarding events as fate and not as a political crisis, he did not think it honorable to try to thwart the results of a victory which he had vainly sought to prevent. His personal dignity and kindness, and the modesty of his retirement, had greatly softened public feeling, and he has been regarded with the pity that always attends sincere self-sophistication. But in the warmest eulogies that have been made of him, however, they always have been vaguely so. He was in no sense a great man, but he may be called truly unfortunate. His name will be remembered as that of a chief figure of one of the worst causes in history, yet a weak man, called to deal with events which he could neither clearly comprehend nor control.

POLITICS IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

OUR friends in other States who sometimes see the New York papers may not exactly understand their references to the political situation of the city of New York. It is important, therefore, that they will see why it may probably be the duty of every sincere Republican to vote against what will be called the Tammany Republican city ticket at the November election.

Tammany Hall, which absolutely controls the city by the most notorious corruption, and which, under popular forms, has annihilated popular government, justly excites the anxious apprehension of all good citizens. But less its power can be broken the most disastrous results and the most desperate civil convulsions are sure to follow. Tammany Hall means civil terrorism and corruption. It relies upon cheating at the polls. Persons hold offices in its pay who are appointed to watch, and to act as gangs of repeaters at the polls. And no free people can long tolerate such a system, when its character is exposed, as that of Tammany now is.

The first duty of every voter, therefore, who means well by the city and desires an honest and urgent popular government, should be the overthrow of Tammany. If the whole opposition to it is able to unite upon a ticket which appears to be either its destruction or a formidable opposition party which would hold it in check. The first object of every true Republican is to defeat those who are opposed to it, that it may be more easily prevail. For this purpose it holds under its control certain persons who call themselves Republicans and still are professedly Republicans. These persons procure places upon Republican committees and nominate Republican tickets, and so far as they can, they direct the action of those bodies as Tammany dictates. There is, further, a certain number of Democrats who, for private reasons, wish to break the power of the Tammany Ring. Some of them, as experience shows, merely "play into the hands" of the Democratic party bought up by Tammany and are silent. But others steadily maintain hostility, and are organized into a party.

In the approaching city election Tammany wishes, of course, that the anti-Tammany Democrats shall be defeated and that there shall not be also a Republican ticket, in order that the opposition vote to Tammany may be divided. If it is true that the Republican party does not nominate with the details of politics will vote for Republican candidates, if they are in the field, rather than for the Tammany Democrats. Tammany has therefore directed its agents in the Republican party to procure the nomination of a ticket which the Republican vote may not combine with the anti-Tammany Democrats. If this plan should succeed, therefore, every man who votes the Tammany Republican ticket votes to sustain the Tammany Ring, while every man who votes the Democratic anti-Tammany ticket, votes to destroy the Ring.

Whether it would be practicable afterward to form a combination of the two great elements of opposition to the Tammany tyranny is not the question. It is enough that it is possible to form an opposition now in order to defeat the actual situation. When the pressing present evil is removed we can consider how to dispose of the next. A wise and honest man does the best that the circumstances allow. The Republican who votes for the anti-Tammany candidates, for instance, for the next Mayor of the city of New York, neither approves that past actions nor adopts the present general political principles of many whom he knows as anti-Tammany Democrats.

Nor is it necessary for Republicans to make any bargain, which in politics is always a very uncertain transaction. If the papers of the party and all those friendly to honest government will make it plain to the voters of the party that the object is the overthrow of Tammany, that alone will be accepted as a sufficient reason for supporting the anti-Tammany ticket. Indeed, it is the only manner in which the grasp of Tammany can be peacefully relaxed, and that result would be an immense relief for the whole country.

Last winter the sympathy and support of the Republicans were asked for the anti-Tammany Democrats, which was avowed to be a movement for the defeat of the Republican party at large, and the appeal, of course, failed. As we said at the time, "Tammany and reform a republic," in which case the Republican party is danger that a change would be only a change of masters. But when a situation is intolerable we must do what we can. The fear that another Democratic Ring might be no improvement is no reason for refusing to break the present one. And if the Republican nominations should be dictated by Tammany Hall, as now seems inevitable, it will be the duty, as we said, of the Republicans to decline to support the ticket.

NOTES.

THE retirement of Secretary COX from the cabinet will be deeply regretted by all who have watched his wise and faithful efforts to secure intelligent efficiency in the service of the government. Mr. COX, however, with many of the most thoughtful and practical of his fellow-citizens, that the purification and elevation of the civil service depend on the establishment of the details of administration upon sound business principles and making honesty and efficiency, and not "skill in politics," the tenure of office—will tend directly to withstand the enormous inequalities and corruptions that are the natural fruits of the patronage of our present system. It is unfortunate that the warm members of the first cabinet of President GRANT who were most conspicuously associated with administrative reform should have left the government in consequence of the pressure of those who believe that the civil service of the country should be organized upon the lowest party considerations. The names of SENATOR CRANDLER and CAMERON, which are constantly mentioned in connection with the retirement of Secretary COX, may probably be accepted as illustrations of the kind of influence which has plunged the country to the services of two of the ablest and most valuable advisers that the President has had—Judge HOAR and General COX. That the interests of a great party like the Republican are safer with gentlemen like these Senators with leaders like the late members of the cabinet we do not believe.

MR. TWEED'S MR. HOFFMAN'S proclamation as Mayor of New York virtually protecting the notorious ballot-box stuffers, his signature of the Erie bill as Governor, making what his own party papers called an "infamous" and "indefensible" bill law, and his appointments of Senate Judges for the general term, are acts so important in their significance that his refusal of declining General WOODFORD'S invitation to discuss political issues together is one of the very smallest parts of which a Governor could be guilty. In a perfectly courteous note General WOODFORD invited Governor HOFFMAN to discuss the issues of the election with him before the people. MR. HOFFMAN when a candidate had done the same thing, and now MR. FENTON, whom he knew not to be an orator, to meet him in debate. But after retaining General WOODFORD'S note for a day, the Governor, either not knowing or deliberately disregarding the conduct that is always expected of gentlemen, instead of accepting or declining with equal courtesy, directs his secretary to write a refusal. That person obeys by writing a note declining as General WOODFORD says as "merely a candidate for office." If MR. HOFFMAN thinks that a Governor may disdain to meet a mere candidate upon the platform, he will find that he must still meet him at the polls.

THE friends of Woman Suffrage, who seem to us sadly to cheapen the cause by the attempt to ask the aid of any party convention that will listen, have at least had in Massachusetts a very distinct revelation of the direction in which they are to look for equality. The Republican Convention courteously received and candidly discussed their proposition, and gave it a very respectful vote. The Democratic Convention laughed it down. The friends of the cause ought to reflect that their position is peculiar. They do not voters, yet their object is to affect voting. But the voters are practically divided into two great parties, the first of which seem to them more important than the extension of suffrage to women. Until, therefore, the friends of the movement of votes in one of those parties to whom this is the paramount issue, and whose election will change the political situation, ought not the movement to remain a moral appeal to public opinion?

THE latest illustration of "reportorial" patience, or else enormous facile pen, we find in the account of an evening party, at which "a gyrating table of appetizing viands were conveniently positioned," and at which was supplied with a relish that can only be experienced on occasions of the free flowing of that beverage."

IT is very good news that comes from Washington, that the Government of the United States will execute the laws protecting honest voting about any foolish persons undertake to violate them at the approaching election. It is to be regretted that there should be any possibility of an attempt to defend cheating at the polls by force. But after the frank exhortation of the World to riot, it would be inexcusable in the Government not to be fully prepared. The talk about bayonets at the polls comes from the reporters and their organs. Yet it is they alone who make such a spectacle possible.

A new commander-in-chief has been appointed to the garrison of the army of the Crown Prince, under General Von Tumpling, and the French Army of the Loire, in which, according to a London telegram, 100 prisoners and forty guns have been captured by the French, who fled in disorder. The French general's report that the defeat of the Minister of War was that a brigade and several companies of Chasseurs were attacked by a superior force of Prussians, numbering from 6 to 8,000, and succeeded in occupying the place. The Prussians were repulsed, by five regiments, with artillery, and a battery of eight guns, but, at 3 P.M., they received reinforcements, and the French were compelled to fall back. The loss of the latter is not known. The Prussians outnumbered the French. A Tours dispatch says much satisfaction is felt there that the French were not promptly reinforced, as there were troops at hand ready, and it is thought in such force there would be no fight. Later accounts state that in this engagement the Seventy-fifth Prussians and Garden Mobiles behaved well, but the regular troops fled at the first fire, many throwing away their arms and accoutrements. The Prussians opened fire on the town, but without effect.

The fall of Metz was an infrared defeat, and that was a repulse.

On the 8th of October a sortie from Metz was repulsed, with heavy loss to the French, and on the 7th a heavy battle was fought at Bellefontaine, in which the loss there was considerable. The French claim to have captured five mitrailleuses which shelled the Prussians, dislodged them from several positions, and cut to pieces a battalion of Prussians. It is stated that Marshal Canrobert made a successful sortie on the left bank of the Moselle.

HERE, in this leafy place,
Quiet he lies,
Cold, with his sightless face
Turned to the skies:
Tis but another dead—
All you can say is said.

Carry his body hence—
Strange must have slaves;
Kings climb to eminence
Over men's graves:
So this man's eye is dim—
Throw the earth over him.

What was the white you touched,
There, at his side?
Paper his hand had clutched
Tight ere he died—
Message or wish, maybe—
Smoothen it out and see.

Hardly the worst of us
Here could have smiled:
Only the tremulous
Words of a child;
Prattle, that has for stops
Just a few ruddy drops.

Look! She said to miss,
Among and night,
His—her dead father's—kiss;
Tries to be bright,
God to mamma, and sweet;
That is all. "Marguerite."

Ah, if beside the dead
Slumbered the pain!
Ah, if the hearts that bled
Slept with the slain!
If they died! But no—
Death will not have it so.

CHAPTER XXVII.
ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.

In a hall of some stead a room of glass, and in that room the inmates of Cross Key Jail were permitted to have access to their legal advisers. They were not lost sight of by the jealous guardians of the place, one of whom perambulated the hall throughout the interview; but though he could see all that passed, he could hear nothing. Mr. Weasel of Plymouth was by virtue of his Cross Key standing a frequent visitor to that transparent apartment, and those prisoners whom he favored with his attention were largely held in high estimation by the warders, as gentlemen who, though in difficulties, had at least some considerable command of ready money. He was waiting now, with his hat on (which he always wore, to increase by many limited stature), in that chamber of audience; and so withered up he looked, and such a sharp, shrunk face he had, that Rachel, and, seeing him in the glass only, might have thought him some dried specimen of humanity, not alive at all, had he not chanced to be in the act of taking snuff; and even that was ghostly too, since it produced the pantomimic action of sneezing without its accompanying sound.

"Mr. Richard Yorke, I believe?" said he, as soon as they were shut up within the walls of glass. "I am glad to make your acquaintance. Sir, though I wish, for your sake, that it happened in another place. You'll excuse me for offering you my hand."

Richard took back his extended arm and turned crimson.

"Don't be offended, Sir," said the lawyer; "but the fact is, the authorities here don't like it. There are some parties in this place who employ very queer legal advisers; and in shaking hands, a file or a gimlet, and a bit of tobacco, are as likely to pass as not. That warder can see every thing, so I hear you say Sir; but he can no more hear what we say than he can understand what a couple of lowlands-bees are saying when they are buzzing up in a double window. He can therefore converse with one another as much without reserve as we please, or rather"—and the little man's eyes twinkled significantly—"as you please. What I hear from a client in the recidivism place is never revealed beyond it, except so far as it may serve his interests. If Mr. Dodge (to whose favor, as I understand, we owe this introduction) has told you any thing concerning me, he will, I am sure, have advised you to be quite frank and candid."

"There was no necessity for such a warning, Mr. Weasel, in my case, I do assure you," answered Richard, earnestly. "I have nothing to conceal from you with respect to the circumstances of my position: they are unfortunate, and doubtless very suspicious; but I am as innocent of this disgraceful charge—"

"Hush, hush! my dear Sir; this will never do. It is mere waste of time, though it might have been much worse. Good Heavens! suppose you had been guilty, and told me that! you would have placed me in the most embarrassing position as to your professional adviser, it is possible for the human mind to conceive. What I want to know is your story, so far as these two thousand pounds found in your possession are concerned. Whether it is true or not, does not matter a button. I want to know whether it seems true; whether it will seem true to a judge and jury. You have thought the matter over, of course; you have gone through it in your own mind from beginning to end—now please to go over it to me."

The little man whipped out a note-book, leaned forward in his chair, and looked all eye and ear, like a terrier watching at a rat-hole.

After a moment's pause, Richard stated his case pretty much as we are already acquainted with it; the little lawyer interrupting him now and then by a quiet nod, or a word in order that he might not set down a point or a memorandum.

"Very good," said Mr. Weasel, when he had done following. "That's your story, is it?"

"It's the truth, Sir."

"Hush! my dear young Sir. We shall have enough of that—the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—a fortnight hence. What you and I have to consider are the probabilities. Why did you go to Plymouth, more than any other place, to change these notes?"

"Because I had heard there was a Miners' Bank there, and Trevethick had mentioned the notes of that company as being as good, in his opinion, as those of the Bank of England. I thought it would be easier to get them changed there than change for those of the Bank of England, than for others of the same bank."

"The check which you showed this Trevethick was not, then, a bond fide piece of paper, eh?"

"It was not," said Richard, casting down his eyes.

"Very good," answered the lawyer, so cheerfully that one would have thought his client had cleared himself of the least suspicion upon that score, at all events. "Now, where did you get it?"

"My mother sent me a blank check, at my request, said I Sir."

"That check is destroyed, you say—you burned it, of course?"

"No; I took it up, and threw it out of the window of the carriage."

"The devil you did!" said Mr. Weasel, in perturbation. "That is not the way to destroy checks. Had your mother an account at the bank on which it was drawn?"

"Of course," said Richard, simply.

"There is nothing 'of course,' Mr. Yorke, in this matter," answered the lawyer, gravely. "Are you quite sure?"

"Quite. She has always had an account there; though to no such amount as two thousand pounds."

"It is a large sum," muttered the lawyer, thoughtfully, "but still they have not lost one penny of it. In case things were going very ill, Mr. Yorke, would an appeal to the prosecutor be likely to be of service?"

"Oh!" sighed not," answered Richard, hastily. "I would not accept mercy at his hands; besides, it is not a question of mercy."

"It may come to that," observed the other, gravely. "We must not deceive ourselves, Mr. Yorke."

"God Heaven! do you believe, then, that I am in this money with some end in view?"

"What my belief is is of no consequence, one way or the other; but my opinion is that the jury will believe that you have told your story as you tell it. The fact is, you have left out the most important part of it. You have left out the conscience-money, the sudden fit of honesty, the scheme," pursued the lawyer, rapidly, and holding up his fingers to forbid the protest that Richard was rising to Richard's lip: "nothing could be more natural, though most imprudent and ill judged, than the scheme of which you tell me, in place of stealing the money than you had; how should she, since it was in a manner her own, profit by her father's sole heiress. You and I see that clearly enough, but a jury used to mere matters of fact, novice but little experienced in human nature, will. What we want, and what we must have, is evidence that you got these notes honestly, or that you thought so, else, but from her fingers. Nobody can hurt her, you know. Trevethick could never prosecute his own daughter for having had an affair dawindles down to a lover's stratagem, and there is no need for prosecution at all. Now, I am told, you had Harry Trevethick into the witness-box. Now can we, Mr. Yorke, or can we not? Shall the prisoner?"

Richard was silent; the lawyer's argument struck him with its full force. He had never scrutinized the matter for his own part, but he feared that Harry might entertain them—they would be only too much in accordance with his jealousies and superstitions nature.

"If I could talk to her alone for five minutes," muttered Richard, uneasily.

"That is impossible," said Mr. Weasel, with decision. "I am sorry for it, little to spare of it as we hold. I could go to Gethin myself, though it would be most inconvenient at this busy time, and refresh this young lady's memory—which, no doubt, is a delicate task, and would be looked upon by the other side with some suspicion. But, I fear, such judicious friend that can be thoroughly depended upon—a female friend, if possible, since the matter may require tact—is not to be found at this little negotiation? Think, my good Sir, think!"

"Why, there is my mother herself!" ejaculated Richard, suddenly. "She is the wisest of counsel, and the very one to undertake so delicate a mission."

"Is she, now, is she?" said the lawyer, cheerily. "Come, come, that's well, and I begin to see a little light. Let her go down to Gethin, where, I, to confess, she is not known, and see Miss Trevethick herself. I should like to see her beforehand, however; indeed, that is absolutely necessary."

"In my note to her, yesterday, I asked her to call at your office in Plymouth on her way hither," stammered Richard. "I thought it better—what is, in fact, the case—that she should hear from you how matters stood."

Mr. Weasel took a copious pinch of snuff, and shut his eyes, as though he were going to sneeze.

Whenever a client got upon an embarrassing topic Mr. Weasel took snuff, to obviate the necessity of looking him in the face: while, in case of any compromising disclosure, Mr. Weasel sneezed, to obviate hearing it.

"In a case of this kind, Mr. Yorke, not a moment is to be lost. I should advise your mother's going direct to Gethin from my house, and making sure of this young lady's evidence. Favor me a possibility—I don't say it is probable, but there is just a chance, you see—that she may be subpœnaed for the other side."

"Just so," assented Richard, so naively that a smile flitted across the little lawyer's face.

"Under these circumstances, then, this is what we will do, my dear young Sir: Mrs. York will go to the Miners' Bank as a guest, and, as I shall venture to suggest, under another name, she will thus have an opportunity of speaking to Miss Trevethick without awakening her father's suspicions; and when she comes to Cross Key, she will bring her news, some good news to bring you, something to talk about (although you must be very careful and guarded, mind that, for you will not be left alone together, as we are) besides mere regrets and lamentations; don't you see, my dear Sir?"

Richard saw exceedingly well, and felt more grateful to his lawyer for devising such an arrangement than he would like to have confessed; nevertheless, he did thank him heartily.

"Not at all, not at all, my dear young Sir," drawing on one of his gloves, in signal of departure. "In a case like this, we must consult strategy as well as array our facts; we must bring heart and head to bear together. Speaking of head counsel, by-the-by, of the subject of counsel. I propose to instruct Mr. Smoothbore, who leads upon this circuit: I gather from your story that there will be no difficulty with respect to funds."

"Whatever may be necessary, Mr. Weasel, for my defense will be, you may rest assured, forthcoming. My mother—"

The man withdrawn from the lawyer's face with electrical rapidity. "Pardon me, my young friend," said he: "but as a professional man, I only deal with principals in these matters. The word forthcoming is a little vague. Counsel are paid beforehand, you must remember."

We must not be angry with Mr. Weasel, who was really a good sort of man after his kind. He was haunting cautions, and if he had been the most trustful of mankind his experience would have taught him suspicion. He did like to see his money down; and really, as to Mr. Yorke, all he knew of his pecuniary position was with reference to the present case, the history of which was not of a nature to inspire confidence.

"I was not aware, Sir," said Richard, haughtily, "that my mother would satisfy all claims; but, in the mean time, there were over three hundred pounds in notes and gold which were found upon me when I was searched at Plymouth. If you doubt me, you have only to make inquiries."

"My dear young Sir," returned the lawyer, deprecatingly, "I have no intention, this is not the first time I have doubted you from the first moment that I saw you in this room, or any other room that could do so. Professional etiquette compelled me to remark that I could treat with principals only. Let me say, then, Let me see," added he, consulting his note-book, "have I any thing more to say? Yes, yes. With respect to the conversation with Miss Harry Trevethick—I did not like to interrupt you at the time, but I see I have made a memorandum—she is pretty?"

"She is very, very beautiful," said Richard, earnestly, the remembrance of her beauty giving him pleasure for the time.

"That's capital!" nodded the lawyer. "Old Bentham is out on circuit this session, and he likes a pretty face. So do we all, for the matter of that, I hope. You are young and good-looking your self, Mr. Richard Yorke; will make something of that, you may depend upon it. Gracious Heavens, is the hour of visiting at the law to smother happy lovers for a mere indiscretion, and make their bright young lives a blank forever? He'll say those unreasonable like that, Sir, in a broken by emotion, and bring you off with flying colors."

"I don't care about the colors, if he only brings me off," said Richard, gravely.

"A very natural remark, my dear young Sir, for one in your present situation; but three weeks hence, in the Assize Court, you may not be so easily satisfied; the more we have, the more we want, you know—except in the matter of money. I have very little to spare of it just now, and must therefore take my leave."

Mr. Weasel shook hands with Richard and his hat, and, with a cheerful nod, had actually placed his fingers on the door-handle, when he suddenly turned round and said: "By-the-by, I had almost forgotten a little form of words, which in your case I am sure will be but a form, and that I do not like to omit it. I never leave a client in your position without asking him the question: Can you trust excuse me, my young friend, and hope, let it harden on, till it was as hard as adamant, for the hour, that, however long delayed, must come at last—of vengeance! He thought of Solomon Coe as one of a dominant race thinks of the slave who has become his master, and was his murderer in his heart ten times a day. He thought of him as the man who would marry Trevethick's daughter, his own Harry, while he (Richard) rotted in jail.

Such were the bitter reflections, creeping fears, and meagre hopes which consumed him when he was alone, that is to say, for five-sixths of the day and all the weary night. In the society of Balfour he found, if not solace, at least some respite from his gnawing cares. The impression which this man had attached to the recovery of stolen goods as mitigating the punishment of crime, and to good luck in the case of a first offender or prisoner, corroborated as it had been by the judicial experience of Mr. Wessel, gave to his confidence in the convict's intelligence; or, at least, in his judgment with respect to the matter on which Richard's thoughts were most concentrated. He was never weary of asking this man's opinion on this point and on that of his own case, the details of which he fully confided to him: Balfour, on his part, gave him his best advice, and gave or comfort he could. He did not resent, nor even seem to be aware of the fact, that the position in which he set himself was by no consequence sympathy in Richard. He had taken a fancy to this young fellow, so different from any companion that he had met with, and was flattered by his confidence; and felt that enthusiasm toward him which friendship, when it exists between two persons of very unlike different grades, sometimes begets in the inferior.

A week passed on, and then, at the same time and place as before, Richard was summoned from his fellow-prisoners. He turned pale in spite of himself, as he rose from the table to go out for the first time, since disgrace had overwhelmed him, his nerves failed him.

"Don't give way, my young master," whispered Balfour, good-naturedly, "for that will only make the warder worse."

Richard nodded, and followed the warder, who on this occasion led the way through a different door. "It ain't Mr. Wessel this time," said the latter, in answer to his look of surprise; "it's a private friend, and therefore we have to go by the have the glass box." He observed him into what would have been a stone court-yard, were it not that it had a roof also of stone. In the middle of this, running right across it, was a sort of cage of iron, or rather a passage some six feet broad, shut in on either side by high iron rails; within this paced an officer of the prison; and on the other side it stood a female figure, which made Richard at once recognised as his mother. It was with but iron cage between them, and in the presence of an official, that prisoners in Cross Key Jail were alone permitted to receive the visits of their friends and kindred. It is no wonder that in an interview under such restrictions, Mr. Wessel should have recommended caution.

To do Richard justice, however, that was not the reflection that now passed through his mind. For all his selfish thoughts and calculations, he had really yearned to press himself once to his mother's breast, and feel once more her loving arms around him; to whisper in her ever-ready ear his sorrow for the past, his accusation of his nature; and when he saw that this was not to be, the heart that he would have poured out before her seemed to sink and shrink within him. In this material obstacle between them he seemed to behold a type of the dread chasm that was impending over him—separation from humanity, exclusion from the world without, a life-long entombment within stone walls. He put his hand and arm through the bars, mechanically, to touch his mother's fingers, and when he found he could not reach them, he burst into tears. It was only by a great effort that Mrs. Yorke could maintain her self-control; but she, nevertheless, did so. Her face was calm, and her eyes, though full of mournfulness and pity, were tearless; only her low, soft voice gave token of the woe within her in its tremulous and faltering tones.

"Dear Richard," it said, "my own dear Richard, take heart; a few days hence, and you will be folded in your mother's arms; but not here. From them again, I trust, my boy, my boy!" She pressed her forehead with its fine white hair against the cruel bars, and seemed to devour him with her loving eyes. "All will yet be well," she continued; "your innocence can not fail to be established, and this dreadful time will be forgotten like an evil dream."

"Have you been to Gethin, mother?"

"Yes, dear; I only came from thence this morning. Harry sent you her best love. Your faith in her, she bade me tell you, is not misplaced; she walks in the witness-box, for certain." This last sentence was uttered in a low French tongue, and very rapidly.

"I am very sorry, ma'am," interrupted the official, who had retired to the further extremity of the cage, "but my orders are to prohibit conversation between prisoners and their friends in a foreign language."

"I will take care not to transgress again," said Mrs. Yorke, with a sweet smile; "your considerate on for us I am sure demands all obedience.

"Has Mr. Wessel made his arrangements, mother?"

"Yes, all; the subpœna will be sent to Gethin to morrow. He is most confident as to the result."

"And what does Mr. Smoothbore say? Have you seen him?"

"No, dear, no. But the matter on which I went to Gethin having been satisfactorily arranged, we may consider that is all settled. Your counsel has no doubt of being able to establish your innocence, notwithstanding the malice of your enemies."

"But what is he like, this Smoothbore?"

"I have not seen him, Richard, we have not got him, but another man, Mr. Balais—quite his equal, Mr. Wessel assures me, in all respects."

"Not got him!" cried Richard, impatiently. "Why, Wessel told me Smoothbore led the circuit. Why have we not secured him?"

"He has been retained by the other side," answered Mrs. Yorke, in a tone that she in vain endeavored to render cheerful. "To say the truth, Richard, the prosecutor is exhibiting the utmost eagerness, and unwillingness to take a fee for a conviction. Money, which he was said to be so fond of, is now no object with him, or at least he pays no regard to it. He has 'nobbled' twelve honest men, nor a righteous judge."

Here the official, who had been stopping his foot on the stone floor. "Those sullen brutes, Trevethick and the other, would have my life, if they could, for nothing but they would not stick at, be assured of that—and do you but Wessel on his guard—to get me out of it. The scamary, was, he said, but a trifle compared with it.

"You have something else to tell me yet, mother—I see it in your eyes. If you go away with it untold, you have no love for me, that's all."

"There is nothing more," answered his mother, hesitatingly, "or almost nothing."

"But is it?" cried Richard, scarcely—"what is it?"

"Well, merely this: that thinking that no money would be spared to help you in this dreadful trouble, Richard, and having but a very little of my own, [—I forgot your debt, dear,] last fast resolution never to ask your father—"

"You did not apply to Carew for money, surely?" cried Richard, turning pale. "Let him know that I was here was ruin."

"I have been ill judged, indeed, dear Richard," replied his mother, quietly; "but it was not ill meant. Do you suppose it cost me nothing to be supplied? But I am sorry you have no scorn nor hate, as you have, for those who have wronged you most. If I can only have to clasp the knees of those whom you despise, in vain."

"Explained you, then—this man?"

"He did, Richard. He told me—who I had not learned from any; I do not ask you to reproach you, dear—what it was that had so long detained you at Gethin. He mentioned, in connection with your case. This man or may not injure you. Mr. Wessel thinks that it will not; but it shows the temper with which this case is pressed by Trevethick—a malice which we are altogether at a loss to understand."

Richard gazed on his face upon the stone without reply, while his mother looked at him in gravest sorrow.

"Your time is almost up, ma'am," said the warder; "there's only a minute more."

"You told her how much depended on her, mother, did you?" said Richard, rousing himself in the effort.

"Yes, dear. She will not fail us, never fear. Keep heart and hope; and as for me, you will be sure that not a moment of worldly time willingly is wasted upon aught but you. I shall see you again, once more at least, before your solicitor be in trial come on; and Mr. Wessel will be here next week again. Is there any thing, my own dear boy, that I can do for you?"

"One moment, mother. Carew has not published you on my account, I trust? He has not set off—"

"The sunuity? Yes; he has stopped that."

"May he rot on earth, and perish everlastingly!"

"Hush, hush, dear; pray be calm; there is no need to fret. I can support myself without his aid; indeed I can; and perhaps he may relent when he gets sure, for he was like a madman as my coming to Crompton. Mr. Whymper will do all he can, I am sure. How cruel it was of me to heed your words, and tell you— Look to him, warder, look to my son!" she screamed.

Richard had indeed turned deadly pale, and though his fingers still mechanically clutched the iron rail, was swaying to and fro; the warder unlocked the passage door, and ran to him just in time to save his falling headlong on the pavement.

"Are you a man," said the agonized woman, "or a coward? Remember, we have risen against the railing passionately—"that you will not let a mother look her son when he is dying?"

"Nay, nay, ma'am; it's not so bad as that," said the warder, good-naturedly; "see, he's coming round again all right. I've seen a many took like that. In half a minute he'll be himself again. It's his trouble as does it, being young. If you'll take my advice, you'll spare both your ron and yourself the pain of parting, and leave him to his rest. I can see by he is, it's a faint, that's all."

"Let me kiss him once," implored the unhappy woman. "Oh, man, if you have ever known a mother's love, let me kiss him once! Here is a five-pound note—take it, and leave me still your debtor—but one kiss."

"Nay, ma'am, I can't take your money; of which, as I couldn't help hearing you say, you have not got too much to spare. But you shall kiss your boney boy, and welcome; and with that the stout warder took the unconscious lad up in his arms, and bore him within the passage; and his mother put her face between the bars and pressed them to his forehead once, twice, thrice.

"Leave him now, ma'am; that will do," resumed the man, impatiently; "and even that is as much as my place is worth. Now, just tap at the door, please, and they will let you out."

Mrs. Yorke obeyed him without a word. She had heard no heavy flattering sigh that betokened Richard's return to consciousness, and knew that the worst was over; unless, indeed, the coming back to life might not be the worst of all.

A PRUSSIAN BATTERY BEFORE METZ.

METZ, which, like Strasbourg, has gained in the present war an excellent reputation for sustaining a severe and prolonged siege, is considered to be one of the strongest fortresses of France. Indeed, it has constantly been declared to be impregnable, and such would seem to be the opinion of the Prussians, as we hear that orders have been given by the King "to avoid further bloodshed, and bide their time," which, remarks a contemporary, signifies starvation. The most contrary reports have been circulated as to the true state of the garrison and inhabitants. The French, arguing in the words of soldiers who had escaped through the Prussian lines, say that Metz is still well provisioned, that the inhabitants are in a rapid spirits, and even that the usual business of the town is still being carried on. The Prussians, on the other hand, have been informed by deserters that the town is in a wretched state, and that the cavalry horses are being killed for food. The French again assert that several ludicrous dispatched from Metz have been picked up containing letters from officers of Bazaine's army, all disclaiming the slightest idea of a capitulation. Whether or not these airy messengers were disjointed more with a view of deceiving the enemy than for the purpose of relieving anxious friends is doubtful, but the former supposition seems far the more likely one.

The illustration on page 693 represents a Prussian battery planted on one of the hills commanding the town.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

The builder of a church now in course of construction, when the roof of its lantih was given, called enigmatically replied that he was "more fitted for the scaffold than for public speaking."

A young man wants to know what business he had better go into that will enable him to occupy a high position in society. Let him try the roofing business. In that trade a smart man will soon get to the top of the ladder.

A rather grim bon mot by Bismarck comes to us from a European correspondent. The Count was dining with other officials immediately after the surrender of Strasbourg, and the conversation naturally turned on the war, and the devastation that followed the progress of the victorious armies. One of the guests remarked that France would pay dearly for her wanton attack on Germany. "Oh no," replied the Count, "it will cost her only ten Napoleons."

A lady in Paris recently gave a concert at her house to which she had invited a gentleman who was known to be a great musical amateur. "I do not suppose," said the lady to him, "that you are familiar with the Marseillaise?" "Oh, ma'am, was the reply, I have often heard it."

"You haven't got such a thing as a pair of old trowsers, have you?" "No, my man," said the merchant; "I don't keep my wardrobe in my counting-house." "Where do you live?" resisted Pat, "and I'll call in the morning for the pair you've got on."

FIRST FOR NEWNESS—Fresh dates.

Smollett tells an anecdote of a half-crazy trot-blister of his day, who, chancing in Rome, stopped one day before the statue of Marcus Aurelius, and, being addressed the dethroned idol: "Sir, if you should ever get your throne above water again, I hope you will remember that I treated you politely in your adversity."

A MAN OF LEVELS—The penny postman.

A sculptor went recently to a well-known lady, and engaged to make a statue of her son. The lady, who declined a legacy, to which her right was disputed. The sum was not, and no more need be said about it. "Now," said the sculptor, "I can copy you perfectly in the bust and trouble myself no further on account." I have nothing to say touch to give you," said the client taken the first step to him," answered the lawyer, gruffly.

THE BEST STATE—Trade.

It was a "Cannon" livery-stable keeper who presented the following bill for the use of a horse:

Antemyonion	01 6
Totalidol	75c. 6d.

In which terms he obviously meant to record the charge for "a horse," and for "the taking of him home," therefore the "total idol." He orthographical peculiarity is owing to the idiom of the country.

Hearing a physician remark that a small blow would break the spine, a lawyer exclaimed: "Well, I dunno 'bout that, for I've heard my sons a number of times, and never broke it yet."

BETTING ON THE FAVORITE.

Our illustration on page 696, given apropos to the fall racing season at Jerome Park, represents a scene that must be familiar to all persons who have visited that pleasant resort—a group of sporting men gathered round the jockey who is to ride the favorite. Such a scene presents a splendid opportunity for the study of character, and our artist, as a glance at his spirited picture will show, has not failed to put it to excellent use.

CHANGES.

BY ANNIE THOMAS.

"Some are married, some are dead."

We were all young then, or at least we were all very much younger than we are now; and we were a very light band. A company of veritable citizens of Prague; a corps of the lighthearted Bohemians that ever fought its little battle for fame and life in that great seat of learning, a joyous, poor, industrious, reckless, war-loving, a joyous, poor, industrious, reckless, free group of young people who were all animated by the hope that "in the days to come" we should distinguish ourselves in our several careers, and win names that might be named with pride.

How we used to play at Redeem and Struggle, at Success and Success, at Disappointment and Defeat, in those bonny, hopeful days! How we used to make our experiments, and educate our composers, and patronize our betters! How we used to plan and hope and encourage! And, above all, how we used to like one another!

We were not all bound for the same goal. There were very few of us bound together by reminiscences of still earlier days. But though we were brought together by the exigencies of our several vocations, we, for a season or two, resembled the "three musketeers" in being "one for all—all for one."

We were all quartered in and about London at the time of which I write, and I fancy we all thought that civilization ended somewhere about the "artists' quarter" in Kensington, and that there was no other smart part about town in the world than that in the Strand. We all painted, or wrote, or sang for money—for the daily bread we are so grateful for the bright, luxurious position in which we indulged so freely. We were all, in fact, young and happy and poor.

Place aux dames. Mrs. Meredith was the queen regnant, by universal consent, of our brilliant little court. She she a widow, and not really forget; for her husband had always been such an unimportant item in her existence that she could contrive to take down the date of his decease. She had been known to the public before her marriage as a graceful singer and a clever art critic; known to a wide circle of admiring friends as charming Ella Vaughan; known, she married she did not sink her individuality, as too many artists do, nor did she suffer her light or genius to be submerged in the cares of domesticity. She drew as correctly, and colored as beautifully, and wrote about the fine arts as cleverly as ever. But she worked harder as Mrs. Meredith than she had ever done as Ella Vaughan, for she was not quite so frequently seen at the opera and in the saloons of titled patronesses of art as her juniors placed by her lion—not that she ever thought it such—for she made her pretty house in the Strada feel the scientific spell for all all whenever we liked to assemble there.

And we liked to assemble there very often indeed. Her little drawing-room was a snug spot to linger in, let the weather be what it would—a soft rose-tinted room, with tones from the Parthenon friezes covering one side—tall, and luxuriously shaped chairs and lounges disposed so that you could study the artistic comfort; flowers in abundance always, and a full provision of light and shade and impressive effect of all missions to picture-galleries, and programmes of concerts, and bills of new plays, and studies from the best of the ballet thing in models.

I remember one afternoon well when several of the most prominent members of La Vieille Jeunesse, as we called ourselves in the height of our foolish, bright enthusiasm, were gathered together in that room. Kate Arden and her two friends, Laura and Mimi Drayton; Flora Bryce, the sculptor; Ellen Hayes, or "Nell," as we called her among ourselves, the novelist; and Miss Gwynne, the musical composer and eminent contralto.

Kate Arden was the most admired, most believed in, most sought after of us all. She had no specialty save that of being beautiful as yet; and, perhaps for this very reason, believing, as we did, that she could do any thing if she only took the trouble, we looked forward to her most hopefully. She was the sister of a prosperous wine-merchant and severe topics, who had long ago shaken himself free of the harmless Bohemianism in which we were all steeped. And she was the child of a golden hue, and was adored by every young artist who had ever come in contact with her.

One of these was making a study of her finely-planned head as she sat on a tiger-skin in Mrs. Meredith's drawing-room this afternoon. His name was Denis Daly, and he was rapidly making his name known by the current which contributed to a rising periodical. He was very young, not above two-and-twenty, and he had a gloriously beautiful dark oval face, and he was the idol of us all in those days. Clever and bright, gay and full of love. Gifted, in fact, with one of those glittering yet deep Irish natures that inform the melodies of Moore, and the eloquence of Burke and Grattan.

His career had only just commenced, and it was a very successful one already. Some short time before, he had come to London without money, without friends, without a prospect of remunerative employment. But there was a magic in his peaceful which charmed the public; and now Denis Daly was a popular pet, and was unspoiled by his popularity. He had the power of winning men as well as women to him. Even at the time when, lavishing compliments on the lovely outlines of the head he was copying, Charles Dudley (or "Curlo," as he was called familiarly), his rival in the favor of Miss Arden, could not hate him. As literary Daly was always celebrating her in his cartoons, under various names, so Curlo was constantly immortalizing her in some sculptured study. And, despite of his prettiest verses, the heroine of his most thrilling romances in two chapters; the object for whom he wasted his ruining himself in cephanoris and pale gray gloves; the reward for which he would gladly have died—he was simply as pieces, if need be.

It was very difficult at that time to discover which of these two were fighting so frankly for her favor had won it. She maintained a strict impartiality, and was chary of bestowing the subject of either, even to her bosom friends. When too hardly pressed for an opinion by one other, she would arrive with decision that she adored them both; that Denis was a dear, and Curlo a darling; and that they were the most perfectly welcome to continue their present system of worship for herself, free from all interference or opposition from her.

Two of these mutual friends were beauties too, but not beauties after the fashion of Kate Arden. One of them, Mimi Drayton, a fair, dreamy-eyed girl, played in a way that made all thought pause, and sang for Arabella Goddard's overthrow. She loved her piano as Denis Daly loved his art, and Charles Dudley his own, and Stella loved her stories of a high crime and folly and society.

Stella was the active agent, the leading spirit, the organizer-in-chief of these frequent gatherings. Sometimes—and more often than not—unfavorably—to the public while still a girl, petted by her friends, spoiled by her family, living a life that was as bright and free from care as a fairy queen's, she was the one of the group for whom the future seemed the least full of hope and things in store. I knew her better than I knew any of the others. If in painting a portrait that many will recognize I idealize a little, I shall forgiven for old friendship's sake.

She was that queer contradiction, a woman with an eastern blood impulse, who yet can take life easily and brightly. In these early days, just after the excitement of her success, when she worked as hard and unceasingly as if she had never made it. She was an anomaly even in that anomalous society—a woman, young, and with a book to be published, or to write an article or review, and yet who could find time to dance or go to one—an Amazon whose whole heart and interest seemed to be centred in the work in which she excelled, and yet who loved a waving anxiety.

The paraonal of a woman can not be pun ished paper easily. Stella will be pronounced unworthy of the prominent position she occupied in that clique whose chronicler I am by betraying. She was attractive enough and good-looking enough to be called handsome, and had the taint of slyness in that subtilty. Small-featured, dark-complexioned, with a look of race about her pretty hands, and a trick of voice that was and had these things, I have said all that need be said as to her personal appearance.

There was a good deal of happy aggressive assurance in her manner at this epoch. She had already made her mark in the world, and whether that mark was large or small, it distinguished her privately. She had her admirers, and her regular pursuits, and her big object—greater success—to fall back upon in all her troubles. And I am inclined to think that these made her rather antipathetic to the motiveless many who moved about her, and intolerant to all such as did not admit her claims.

By her side on this special April afternoon, Denis Daly, who was, perhaps, the only one of men who had made their marks, too, in literature, but in such ways as did not clash with the general correspondence of her leading "daily," and a blooming celebrity in the person of a buxom widow, perfectly well to do, and generally known and reputed already to make their opening expressed expectations of future fortune and success. Between these two Kate Arden, herself untured men, who made the most of those circumstances which threw them into the best society one hour, and into the bar of a tavern the next, to write about it (the society).

Mrs. Meredith was a little right than the corner in which Stella had enthroned herself. Miss Gwynne, the sharp-featured, sharp-tongued leader of the piano, and half hummed, half sang a song, the words of which Stella had written, called "Other Lives," and found by her side, and evidently under the distinction such singing of her words gave her.

I was ambitious in those days of following in Stella's footsteps, but she seemed so far above me then that I had only the hope of successfully emulating her in my dreams. She had got me started—that is my work, she had got about half of mine accepted in one or two second-rate magazines. So I believed in her—in her present excellence, and in the performance of her future high aspirations—more heartily than any of the others.

What was I? I will introduce myself last—when I have brought one of the merry band of our band to the fore. A Mr. Warren—a romantic realist, if ever there was one in this world, who wrote prose poetry of a splendid order by the yard whenever he was pushed, and understood the classics better than he understood his bread. I used sometimes to fancy: a clever, brilliant man, of exceptional cultivation and genius, a gentleman of good birth, a man of letters, whose high position in letters was widely recognized, might have a strange chance, a terrible fate in and yet, by some strange, hollow confraternity.

He was older than any of the rest, and his coming among us was the work of accident, not design.

Stella had been the agent in this case, as she was, indeed, in most cases of new introductions. She had seen him at an outside party, and had set herself the congenial task of winning as much success for him as a woman's regard as it were to win and him to give. How she succeeded was best known to herself. At any rate, he had brought it with him to follow her into her own familiar places, and for a while he was regarded as an interloper by the whole band.

For myself, I would fain describe myself simply as I have described the rest. But, in telling of these things, I am reminded far more by Stella's spirit than I am by my own. She would have described me as "Miss Owen—a favorite of ours," who thinks she will write as well as I do some day. I know you think that impossible, Mr. Warren, encouraging me as the excellent and unexcelled thing I am. Still Miss Owen is not so utterly despicable as you have made her one other time." Miss Stella would say before me; but I have reason to believe that behind my back her words were not quite so complimentary, as their friendship justified them in being.

Why were we assembled in Mrs. Meredith's drawing-room at her half-Sunday, half-smiling April afternoon? I really don't know, unless it was that we found pleasure in each other's society, and so sought it with a motive, or without a motive, whenever the opportunity occurred. My way of accounting for having got in there, Mrs. Meredith was showing us her great picture of "Rosa Bonheur in her Studio," which had been sent by hand already; and, by way of excuse for having come at her impromptu bidding, we were all taking a great verbal interest in where it "ought to have been hung," if only she had finished it in time for this year's Academy.

Miss Stella was the only preoccupied and rather selfishly shocked one among us this day.

"You positively paint live in the clouds so far as every thing else is concerned," she said, when "Other Days" had come to an end, and the general gathering round the easelon which "Rosa Bonheur" was stretched.

"And you positively write expect the rest of the world to be constantly agape about what you have written—different forms of the same delightful subject in your mind; that is all, dear," Mrs. Meredith said.

"After all, with such dramatic power as Miss Stella undoubtedly possesses—we all agree that she does possess it"—Mr. Lacy, the aspirant for honors in landscape painting, was the speaker—"we agreed that she did possess them—and then he went on," said the voice of the artist, "that she began learn 'business,' and write for the stage."

"Nobody would act as I intended. People never do in real life," Stella said, laughing.

"We all do as you wish us to do, as far as you favor no by making your wishes known," Mr. Warren said, quietly. "Take me, for example: I have given up making classical puns and making verses for ballets."

"And I have really tried to do something better than make pretty bonnets, and went them out at the Zoo on Sundays," Miss Laura said, sighing.

"And I have humiliated myself before a man of no publishing taste in the world, and got him to publish something higher than the tweedledum-and-tweedledee pretensions that sell so largely with your reconciliation," Miss Gwynne chimed in. "Ungrateful creature, to say you can't get people to act as you wish them to act, when Mrs. Meredith and Mr. Lacy are acting as if they were in love with you, and we all know you will win."

"Hush!" Kate Arden said, coming to the rescue, with her grand air and cool tones—"hush! you are not to say that Stella wishes that's the beauty of it—of her, I mean. What were we talking about before Mrs. Meredith made honorable mention of Mr. Warren and Mr. Lacy?"

"I will tell you what Stella wishes just now," Stella said, quietly. "We are all going to immortalize ourselves in our several ways, of course; but each one is to be happy and happy and fond of each other and insignificant, let us immortalize ourselves in concert."

"Yes, I see—a literary partnership with you, but I don't care to increase the firm," Mr. Warren said, laughing.

"Let us start a magazine, and keep it up by ourselves, unaided by any one else," Charles Dudley struck in.

"Let us make Stella the editress," Denis Daly struck in.

"Let us put on the frontispiece for it, Daly," Mr. Lacy said.

"Let us start talk over the title first," Brand—the man who had been war-correspondent for a "daily"—interrupted.

"Let us have the name of a place or of a firm, will we?" Stella pleaded. "Let us have something peculiar to ourselves."

"'Unfit for Publication,' would take no end," Mr. Lacy said; and then Denis Daly sat down to sketch out the outline of a pictured back for the embryo magazine.

"All of us—look here!" he said, drawing away as fast as he could. "Something quite original, and something exclusive, accompanied peculiar to ourselves—the title suggestive, by all the circumference and the one subscriber, on her way to Bedlam."

"We ought to meet at least once a week, to talk over its contents," Mr. Selwyn said.

"We might as well make out a programme of the entertainments to-night," Mr. Lacy added.

"Mrs. Meredith, may we stay a little longer," Stella asked, imploringly, of our hostess; and our hostess said, "Yes, if we could put up with the remains of last night's supper" (I forget to say that we had all been at a party at her house the previous night), "instead of a proper dinner.

"Chicken and lobster salad and Hungarian wine would be enough for me," Denis said, and we all chorused our satisfaction at staying.

"Let us rejoice in its being spring and not autumn, when we can have oysters, and needn't go out of town," Mr. Brand said.

"Let us have oysters more especially over the latter fact," Stella said. "London, dear London! I suppose some people live out of it, but I don't. I am the savage that will have all the year round out of reach of Piccadilly, I have heard."

"For my part, I am more sympathetic with life in the 'Modern Athens,' than with London life: the Bohem of my day would have been in Athens," Mr. Warren said.

"So you say, because it's over," Stella said, slowly. "Mrs. Daly will make Denis look to his laurels, and—"

"As for you," Mr. Lacy interpreted, "servant of your fellow-mortals"

"—may crowd in an eleventh as an absolute matter of crime;

"In order to contradict them, and you'll do it in a novel.

"And the critics will declare to be—"

"A step from the sublime," Stella interrupted, laughing. "I know they will; but there's one thing the critics can't do, and that they can't do that one thing I can suffer and be strong under their censure."

"What's the one thing?"

"They can't banish me from London; if, for any bad purpose, they could send me into the country to become subjective, I should soon get where Denis Daly is sending me in his frontispiece.

"A good wholesome course of the study of butter-cups and daisies would do you good," Mr. Brand said.

"So another of my friends said," Stella retorted; "either that or starvation in an uncomfortably furnished garret was the medicine he proposed for the cure of my perversity.

"The study of butter-cups and daisies, under certain conditions, wouldn't be bad," Charles Dudley said.

"When you make your great success—which, of course, will be with your book—take a house at Richmond, Stella," Kate Arden said.

"Too far—altogether too far. I think every thing ought to take place in Piccadilly, and every one ought to live in one or other of the adjoining streets.

"Put your theory into practice as soon as possible, Miss Stella. You know whether I would go and live on the top of the Monument, if you said you liked the situation."

"Now I can understand that sort of love of place, if Faris were the place loved," Kate Arden said.

"And I can understand it if it were expressed in the Arcadian terms of the blue Mediterranean," Mr. Warren put in.

"And I think we can all understand it about London," Mr. Brand exclaimed; "for my own part, I honestly confess that at least half the income for which I am working is based on its environs; I can walk in any other city in the world, but I can't walk in London."

"And I don't like walking anywhere, Teddy; so the inability is no drawback," Mr. Lacy said.

"Don't you think Kate and Mr. Selwyn are going on very fivorably?" Mimi Drayton whispered to Miss Bryce.

"I hope not," that young lady replied, energetically; "we ought to remember that in this generation we should be no talk of marrying and giving in marriage among us—at any rate, there should be no talk of it for ourselves. The world is full of folly and sin; we needn't go and add to it yet a while."

"Very fine saying as if she didn't know we all know that she would marry to-morrow if she could, and is playing a riding-horse and a carriage kept for her," Miss Gwynne said, laughing.

"Will you all come to me and discuss her charms on Sunday evening?"

"Yes," we all chorused; "and you won't let any one else in, or we'll go to you as Mrs. Stella added. "Human beings should be occasionally forced to rely on their own conversational resources, for instance, to stand sweet on two legs, and talk to their fellow-creatures without looking either up or down."

"You may talk to as many of your fellow-creatures as you can get to listen to you, Stella," I said as I made a desire to give you something to talk about, Miss Hayes, let me offer you a box at the Prince of Wales's for the course of time to see my new burlesque," Mr. Lacy said; and Stella accepted his offer with a warmth of acquiescence that made her entirely forget the other engagements she had already made for "to-morrow evening."

"You have been going about so much lately, won't you be late with the copy for the novel that is announced as ready on the 1st of May?" Mr. Brand said, laughing. And then we all began to make plans for going to the Royal Academy together on the 1st of May, and for eating ices in Grange's afterward.

The 1st of May came—day of high hopes and bitter qualms! and a goodly number of those whom I have been striving to depict drifted together, in the way we had of drifting together, in the rooms at the Royal Academy. We had come to see the people and each other, we met pictures, on this the first day, so we moved about, or sat still and gossiped with each other, and made no efforts to see how art had progressed since 1865.

"The man who appreciates color to that degree can never go back to drawing on the wood," Denis Daly said, after a long look at a marvelously study in white, by a great colorist, that you.

"Don't you get on to color yet, then; wait till you've liberated me as you promised the other day," Stella said.

"I think working together in the way we contemplate is sure to be successful," Denis Daly said. "You see author and artist will consult each other, and will not be in danger of illustrating some other meaning than yours."

"The social millennium for engineers, eh, won't it?" Mr. Lacy asked. "During that time, at least, the flock is safe to fly together, for we all have an interest in each of you."

"And after that time," Stella said, "there is great pleasure in the thought that we may play our parts on the same stage. We are bound to follow out our respective careers in London. Where else can we go to succeed—to live, even?"

"We needn't ask where, because we would none of us try it if we were told. Look at the eminent author of 'Clogging his Wheels;' don't you wish you knew how he did the trick with that book: Miss Hayes?"

"Miss Hayes wins by honors," Mr. Warren said, lounging up to the group.

"He will, no doubt presently that Stella is a lady, and will congratulate her on being a scholar and a gentleman," was a casual acquaintance of Mr. Lacy's remarked.

"You're wrong there," that gentleman said.

"There are a few young that Warren never forgets—himself and the presence of a lady."

Those bright, happy days—bright in spite of many clouds, happy in spite of many disappointments! Well-watched, well-applauded work must always be a delightful thing to the worker. In the case of artists "the labor they delight in physics pain," undoubtedly.

The guild was a very pleasant one. It was one of interest, keen sympathy, and unselfish good-will. Its kind and repeated visits to Stella kindly said about each other. We prognosticated brilliant successes for each other, and would have worked and sacrificed for each other, had need been; and as there was no need for us to work and sacrifice for each other, we were merry together, and said kind things about each other's probable destinies. On the whole, we were kinder for our brightness, and kinder for our kindness toward each other; and if our lives were unselfish, and our work unselfish, there was nothing unhealthy about either.

It was a very sunshiny period; and it passed.

It is not very common since we are grown-up that we can go on meeting in the same way for just ten years—and then the flock is scattered. Denis Daly, the best liked of them all, the one who had made his mark the earliest in life and in his hazards the most successful, is beyond us all now, far above even what we had prognosticated for him—buried in the Crimea—dead. And nearly all the rest of the little band had declared itself to be like heaven, in that "it in there was no marrying or giving in marriage," are "wedded wives" and husbands now.

The destinies of all are rather different to what was then imagined for them. Kate Arden and Charles Lacy have thrown in their lots together, and she fulfills the onerous duties of wife as well as she did those of admired beauty. Stella has married a clergyman, whose flock feeds in a sequestered spot far out of reach of the sound of the roar of Piccadilly.

As for myself! Well, I find it hard sometimes to realize that

"Some are married, some are dead."

TALKING-MACHINES.

A DISTINCTION between the human and the deceptive in these contrivances deserves to be noted. There have been some very curious speaking and singing machines in which the talking and singing really came from human lips, under such circumstances as led the audience to believe that mechanism produced the sounds. We know very little about Roger Bacon's speaking head; but there is reason to believe that, if the machine were ever produced at all, the sounds emitted came from human lips. A similar supposition, called the Invisible Girl, was a deception in which much ingenuity was displayed. The machine there was a girl or lady concerned, who did the talking and singing, and who was invisible to the audience; the deception consisted in leading the visitors to suppose that she was in a small globe suspended in mid air. There were four upright posts, united at top by four horizontal rails, like the frame-work of a table. Bent wires, swinging up from the posts, supported an ornamental centre; and from these wires was suspended a hollow copper ball, with four trumpet-mouths on four sides. The ball was for visitors saw. Any person wishing to propose a question, spoke into one of the trumpet-mouths; and presently afterward an appropriate answer came from all the four mouths. The voice was so soft that it seemed to come from a very young and diminutive being indeed—a fairy, an invisible girl. French and Italian were spoken by the voice as well as English; witty and lively remarks were made, as well as questions answered; and songs were occasionally sung in silvery tones. It was admitted on all hands to be an attractive exhibition; and it was by some means of verifying the fact that the globe touched nothing whatever, except four ribbons by which it was suspended, the surprise felt was great. The facts of the case were these: One of the posts was hollow, as were two of the rails; and there were openings in the rails just opposite two of the trumpet-mouths. In an adjoining room was a lady seated at a piano-forte; a very small opening in the partition between the two rooms enabled her to see what was going on; while a concealed tube was carried from a point near the left ear of her to the hollow post of the machine beneath the floor. Sounds, as we know, travel very quickly through tubes; and thus the questioning, the answering, the singing, and the piano-forte playing, were transferred from room to room. When a spectator asked a question, speaking at one of the trumpet-mouths, the sound was reflected from the trumpet back to the opening in the horizontal rail, which opening was neither seen nor suspected by the audience; it went down the tube to the lady at the piano in the adjoining apartment, where the lady heard it; and the sounds in the opposite direction were conveyed and conveyed. The sound became so altered in character and intensity by this process of transmission as really to seem to come from the ball; and when an answer was given to a question expressed in a whisper, the impression was very strong that the answer really came from the ball.

But the most interesting contrivances are those in which the sounds are really produced by a mechanism of pipes, bellows, keys, vibrating reeds, &c. Musical instruments such as some cases been played with surprising success by such means, imitation of the expenditure of an almost incredible amount of time, patience, and ingenuity in devising the requisite arrangements. Vaucanson's flute-player was a wonderful example of this kind. It was a lifesize figure, dressed in the costume of the period, (about 1730), and standing on a pedestal, both figure and pedestal being full of delicate mechanism. Behind the pedestal was a large machine. When wound up with a key, the figure played real music on a real flute. Air was propelled from the mouth to the embouchure or mouth-hole of the flute; and the force of the current was modified by the fingering of the masses of different passages, as well as the different pitch of their octaves, the opening between the lips being varied to suit the requirements of desired effects. The fingers, made of some elastic material, stopped the holes in the manner proper for producing the several notes. The machine was constructed to play a certain number of tunes, beyond which it could not go; and soon afterward the same clever mechanician produced his automaton flute-player, which was a flageolet had only three holes; and so diverse was the intensity of wind required to produce all the notes of a flageolet, that the mechanism for the pressure varied from one ounce for the lowest note up to fifty-six pounds for the highest. Another of his productions was his automaton pipe and tambour player; the figure of a shepherd, standing and playing on a pipe held between a tambourine and a small drum) with a stick held in the right hand. This automaton musical performer, exhibited about sixty years ago, was quite a triumph of ingenuity. A figure, dressed in the ancient costume of Arcadia, and playing tunes when wound up by a key, played the Austrian Cavalry March, and a number of others. Weigl, on a trumpet, and was accompanied by an orchestra, the sounds of the trumpet being admirably produced by the figure. Mr. Merlin, inventor to that of a French trumpeter of the Guard, the figure played a French Cavalry March, and, finally, a march by Dussek, and an allegro by Pleyel. When we consider the numerous modifications of pressure of breath the lips of the trumpeter touch the small end of the trumpet, the production of such results by machinery is certainly surprising. Soon after Maelzel's time Maillardet produced an automaton piano-forte player. The figure of a lady, seated at a piano-forte, played no less than eighteen tunes, keeping on for an hour when once wound up; the machinery was laid open at intervals in such a way as to show that it was really mechanism that did the work. Keys or levers were pressed and depressed with the fingers in the usual way, but the flats and sharps were produced by pressing on petals with the toes. Much more ingenuity in making this lady more graceful in her attitudes and movements than in producing the cases with automata. Somewhere about 1820 there was an exhibition of two automaton flute-players at Leipsic. In the two figures plays different pieces, which must have required a vast amount of clever mechanism.

Wolfgang von Kempelen, inventor of the farfamed automaton chess-player, constructed a talking figure which could "pronounce articulate thought, tune, and inventive ingenuity. First he made experiments with tubes and vibrating reeds, which enabled him to imitate the sound of the Continental "a," like our "ah"; then, with a tube and a bellows, and by the motion of the jaws, he produced the sounds of "m," "o," "u," which combined perfect "e," and finally, with the consonants "p," "b," and "t," and afterward a few others; but there were some consonants and vowels which he could not succeed in imitating. Having combined the results of his researches, he constructed a head, which contained the requisite wind-tubes and vibrating reeds, and a bust provided with some kind of bellows. This armed, his automaton could pronounce the words "opera," "astronomy," "Constantinople," "you can see me speak," "I love you dote de tout mon cœur," "Leopoldus secundus," and "Romanum imperator semper Augustus." The last was the most difficult word the machine was wound up, without any player being required to press upon keys and pedals. Tubes to imitate nostrils produced "m" and "n;" a funnel and a reed changed "o" into "e," "ah," and "j;" and there were various pieces of mechanism to imitate more or less successfully the movements and action of mouth, lips, teeth, tongue, palate, glottis, lungs, etc. Altogether, it was what the chess-player was not—really an automaton.

Professor Willis and Sir Charles Wheatstone some years ago attracted a good deal of attention to this matter; not, of course, for any exhibitory purposes, though they made the production of vocal sounds in a scientific way. Sir Charles showed the results of his experiments at one of the meetings of the British Association. Professor Willis separated all the sounds, whether letters or syllables, emitted in speaking, into three groups, which he called mutes, sonants, and narinonants. Doctor Rosi, of Philadelphia, adopted the same classification into tonic mutes, thonic diphongous, subtonics, and aspirants. Willis, having consonants sorted, made experiments in the mode of producing vowel sounds by mechanism. With an ear chest, vibrating reeds, and cavities and tuber of different kinds, he produced a great variety of sounds. One curious result of his experiments was, that with the same apparatus, drawn out gradually in length, he could produce in succession all the vowel sounds which are heard in such English words as "saw," "pat," "pay," "pet," "pin," "pique," "no," "move," "nut," "bird," "pull," "we" (as in effect, that the lips protrude more and more as this series advances; and this supplies a noteworthy confirmation of the views held on this matter by the experimenter.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

EVERY day the most shocking reports reach us concerning the atrocities practised in the fiere Bayonnaise campaign. It is to be feared that the French soldiery number the helpless inhabitants of some defenceless village and destroy it for their dwellings' sake. It is the French, who show barbaric ferocity toward wounded prisoners, of which statement there is every one they fancy a spy. From both sides come similar details of barbarity, each from which our disgust grows wonderingly away. Whether these details are exactly correct in special cases is hardly worth while to ascertain, since the crimes of them necessarily prove the Prussians or the French to be more barbarous in their warfare than civilized nations have been before. The truth is that all war is demoralizing, and leads naturally to unnecessary atrocities and unnecessary crime. Wherever war rages there also rage the worst and vilest human passions—and in the horror of all ongoing of the strife, that in the hearts of multitudes, whose better feelings are overborne by hardships, sunstroke of resources, and the constant sight of carnage and bloodshed. And not only driving war do extraordinary cruelties and crimes occur, but in the settlement of disputes of reckless deeds equally fearful. Ever since our civil war a number of persons have come to and out of rights of person and property has been apparent among certain classes. Now, we begin to estimate the long train of evils consequent upon this French and German conflict?

The peculiar power of recollecting facts possessed by superintendents of asylums, and also knowledge of physiognomy, were valuable to him in his detective business. Coming in contact with an old medical gentleman, Jourdain looked at him a moment, and said, "Your name is ——." The man said, "Yes." "I have not seen you for twelve years; where have you been?" "I have been exiled," was the reply, "for seven or five years, and was in California until a week ago." "You know how to leave the city," said Jourdain, "if you wish to have no questions asked. I will travel to Sing Sing on the lightning express." The man took the hint and left.

Many trite sayings have been uttered about Doctor, as well as concerning all the other months. How it seems ever to be given there is a matter of speculation. If there is not more truth than poetry in the following, not much reliance can be placed upon the sayings:

"October warm with certain speed
Makes December very cold indeed.

"If there is in October much frost and wind,
January and February will be mild and fine;
But when in the autumn the weather is clear,
The cold wild will come on with August."

"Much rain in October, much mud in December."

"October boisterous, winter will be severe."

"Changeable weather winter will stay."

"Do not let October flies Land you in the rapin stirks."

"In October the thunder, though sounding dear, Shows that all January is better to hear."

There is an enormous traffic carried on between the two shores of the Bosphorus, and the daily caused by the opening and closing of the bridge of boats, which form the only means of communication, is very troublesome. Accordingly, the following method has been to be thought of, as the water is extremely deep, with twenty or thirty feet of mud at the bottom. Engineers of the nineteenth century, however, are not to be lightly baffled, and Mr. Haddon, chief engineer to the Turkish government, has suggested a means of solving the problem. He proposes to suspend or bend a tunnel at about the mean level of the water, allowing uninterrupted passage to vessels of the largest tonnage. The tunnel is to be a wrought-iron tube about 10 feet in diameter and 1200 feet long. It would weigh about 600 tons; and would require 1200 tons of lead; concrete and lining, to overcome the buoyancy of the tube, 1700 tons; water ballast, among, 2300 tons. Great care and strength will necessitate the upward strain when the train is not passing.

Since the opening of the Brooklyn Eye and Ear Hospital, in October, 1869, 4780 patients have received treatment.

Soon after the organization of the American Board, in 1810, by the General Association of Congregationalists in Massachusetts, the Presbyterians were invited to join the mission work. They labored harmoniously together until the separation of the Old and New School in 1837. After that the New School Presbyterians alone joined in labor with the Congregationalists. Since the recent great Presbyterian reunion, merging Old and New School in the same organization, the latter have felt it expedient to withdraw from the American Board, not from any dissatisfaction, but simply because the Presbyterian Mission Board, in their judgment, specially claims their services. At the meeting of the American Board in Brooklyn this matter was fully discussed, and the separation effected with friendly reluctance to parting, but with the most cordial good-humor and honorable generosity.

When Minister Washburne was compelled to abandon his residence, situated on the Avenue de l'Impératrice, he rented for him a house in the rue de Babylone. He abandoned all his furniture and valuables —according to report—including a fine portrait of Napoleon Bonaparte.

A charge of 2000 francs is made by the balloon company for conveying a passenger out of Paris.

A new mitrailleuse has been tested in the presence of a special commission at Vincennes. It is worked by steam, and capable of projecting balls darting twenty or thirty hours consecutively without becoming heated. A mechanism of two-horse power has been found for an supplement of twenty barrels. The range is about the same as the Chassepot. The inventor has offered to make 300 of them in eight days.

The harvest in Germany this year has been gathered largely by German women, assisted by men too old or too young to join the army.

When the Italian army invaded Rome, the Papal troops were ordered, in case they should be repulsed, to concentrate around the Vatican. And in the hour for capitulation had evidently come, Pope Pius was standing in the centre of the hall of the Vatican surrounded by his special friends, among whom was Cardinal Antonelli. Antonelli, after a few words, fainted on a

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA.

THIS city is on the Alabama River, and, from its central position, was first selected by the Southern people as the capital of the seceded States. It is a place of considerable importance in the cotton trade, large amounts being shipped down the river to Mobile.

The Capitol building occupies a commanding site, and is conspicuous from the surrounding country. The streets are wide and dusty, suggestive of the least interesting portions of Washington. High banks rise on both sides of the river, cut into picturesque gullies, or stretching like a wall for miles, adown which the cotton bales are pitched to the steamers below, as well as the cord-wood required to feed the furnaces.

FRENCH PROVINCIAL SOLDIERS IN PARIS.

THE Garde National Mobile of France is composed of those young men who, from the year 1867, have escaped from military service, either through having drawn a lucky number in the conscription, or through insufficiency of height, being the only son of a widow, or some other exemption, and of those who, drawing an unlucky number, were rich enough to pay for a substitute. They are termed "Mobiles," and the duration of their term of service is five years. But few exceptions, and, except for special reasons, no substitutes are allowed. One member of a family, however, may replace another, always providing that the remplaçant is not more than forty years old.

The Parisian Mobiots were the first called out in the present war, and a large camp was accordingly allotted to them at Chalons. Finding, however, that camp life was not so comfortable and easy as they had at first supposed, the Mobiots began to murmur, and were therefore transferred to the camp of St. Maur, almost under the walls of their beloved capital. Here they calmed down a little, but, on the approach of the Prussians, were removed into Paris itself.

The provincial Mobiot is a far different being from his Parisian brother. Unused to the luxuries and enervating amusements of the capital, he is much more suited to endure hardships, and far less disposed to grumble at them. Accustomed, also, to respect his curé, and to regard his mairo as infallible, he does not possess that turbulent and irreconcilable spirit so unfortunately characteristic of the Parisian populace, and thus is, as a rule, respectful and obedient to his superiors. Besides, in many cases, the excitement of visiting and residing in Paris, and of seeing and examining those wonders of which he has heard so much from his soldier cousin, and of which he has read such stirring descriptions in the Petit Journal, has overcome his disgust at leaving his native province, even if his patriotism and determination to expel the invader had not already been sufficient to check any such discontented thoughts.

The behavior of the Garde Mobile in the recent skirmishes round Paris has been admirable; and this carries out another of General Trochu's pet theories, so ably set forth in his "L'Armée Française," namely, the non-superiority of veteran over young soldiers. In a skirmish at Villejuif on September 19, the Mobiles were reported to have "fought most bravely, with the steadiness of old troops," while the Zouaves—those boasted heroes of the French army—ran away almost at the commencement of the affair. Indeed, the Mobiots are now as much relied on as they were formerly laughed at, and certainly the readiness and aptitude with which they have learned the several military exercises are simply marvelous.

The illustration on page 692 represents a detachment of provincial Mobiots having taken possession of, and fairly established themselves in, a shop in the Rue Lafayette, which, as it bore the now superfluous inscription of "Boutique à Louer," was immediately appropriated as a convenient residence for the time being. There they are making themselves at home, and enjoying themselves while they can, with the genuine soldier's philosophy. Some are eating at a table improvised out of the counter, another is being shaved by a good-natured comrade, others are reposing outside, while the sentry on duty looks amusingly conscious of the important trust confided to him.

GENERAL TROCHU AND THE NATIONAL GUARD.

THE review of the Parisian National Guard, held by General Trochu a few days before the final closing of the gates of Paris, may well be reckoned as one of the most remarkable and stirring spectacles on record. For the first time for twenty years Paris appeared openly and powerfully armed.

The review was hardly a review in the strict sense of the term, for there was no maneuvring, and not even a march past, the whole affair partaking much more of the nature of a demonstration. The troops drawn up in line extended from the Place de la Bastile, through the Boulevards to the Place de la Concorde, and the battalions which arrived late were stationed down the side streets. The variety, and in many cases the insufficiency, displayed in the equipment of this army of some two or three hundred thousand men, plainly showed with what patriotic haste the government had armed them. There were but very few old regiments, and the new were easily distinguishable by the determined air with which they manipulated their weapons. Many regiments, however, were entirely composed of workmen, who, having formerly served in the army, were perfectly acquainted with all the drill and the routine of military manœuvres. Some were armed with the old muzzle-loader, others with transformed carbines furnished with the sword-bayonet, others with the tabatière, and a select few with the Chassepot. All, however, were armed, but few had uniforms, many wearing only the képi, and some not even that.

About noon, General Trochu, mounted, and in full costume, followed by a small staff, and M. Tamisier, the new Commander of the National Guard, arrived at the Place de la Bastile. He was received with great enthusiasm, and loud were the shouts of "Vive Trochu!" intermingled, of course, with "Vive la République," as he passed up the line, acknowledging with his képi the thousands of salutes that welcomed him.—The usual mode of saluting, by die-by, being a hat whirled round on the top of a bayonet. Many of the muzzles, however, were ornamented with large bouquets, giving a strange variety to the scene.

Another peculiar characteristic of this review was the almost total absence of spectators—there were none to look on. All the available population of Paris was in arms. Behind the ranks there were a few women and children, and from one or two of the neighboring houses handkerchiefs might be seen fluttering. Some ladies, it is true, threw down from their windows bouquets tied up with tricolored ribbon as the General passed, but this was all. The "ride past" over, the troops dispersed to their several quarters, many to take their station on the ramparts, where sentinels had already been posted.

How different was this inspection of ununiformed, undisciplined, and all but unarmed troops to one of the old reviews in the Champ de Mars, when NAPOLEON III., attended by a brilliant staff, of whom but few now remain, would put his favorite Zouaves or Cent Gardes through their paces in the sight of thousands of admiring Parisians! And now! It seems hardly credible that this was but three months ago.

THE LATE JOHN JOURDAN.

THE death of Superintendent JOURDAN, whose portrait we give on this page, deprived New York of the services of an efficient and thoroughly honest man, who, as manager of the Police Department, held one of the most important places of trust in the municipality. The story of his official life is too well known to be retold here; and it is sufficient praise to say of him that he enjoyed the confidence of all parties, and was sincerely hated and feared by the criminal classes.

BALLOONS IN WARFARE.

ON our first page this week we give a representation of the departure of M. GAMBETTA and two American gentlemen from Paris, in balloons, of which we gave a brief account in our last Number. As the adventurers passed over the investing lines they were saluted with muskets, bomb-shells, and rifle-balls from the Prussian batteries, and some of the missiles whizzed unpleasantly near their aerial ships. Fortunately for them, the range was too long and the mark too uncertain for accurate firing, and the wind at length bore them in safety beyond the hostile lines.

The use of balloons in warfare was first practised by the French at the battle of Fleurus, during the siege of Mayence, and during that of the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, on which occasion they were found of great utility. The "Annual Register" of 1794 says:

"The French armies are attended with a new species of reconnoitring engineers, whose business it is to do every thing relative to the perspective use of the balloon. The person who mounts in the balloon is furnished with pencil and portfolio on which, and the marks to be made are agreed on beforehand, and the balloon, after being properly fixed, is attached to a small rod paper, after being properly fixed, is attached to a small rod like an arrow, one end of which is loaded and pointed, the other rests on the ground and stands upright. A small line of colored silk is attached to the other end like a flag, to render it more visible. This is dropped from the balloon on ground that is in possession of the army to which the balloon belongs, and thus the information obtained is fully communicated."

After the expulsion of the Austrians from Liége, in 1794, by General JOURDAN, they retired to a strong situation at some distance, where they threw up intrenchments, intending to wait for reinforcements. Before, however, these could arrive, they were attacked by the French on the 18th of September of that year, and found no resource after a great slaughter on both sides. The success of the French was attributed in great measure to the discovery of the position and movements of the Austrians made by two engineers whom the French sent up in an balloon. From his balloon the engineers perceived whatever was being done in the Austrian camp, and gave continual notice of all they saw by notes which they threw down among their own people. By these means the number of troops in the camp, the quantity of their artillery, their motions and probable designs, were made known to the French, who directed their attacks accordingly against the weakest parts, assaulting these with the largest bodies of their troops, and with greater confidence from the probability of success.

THE GERMAN FAIR.

A GRAND fair for the benefit of wounded soldiers within the German lines was opened recently in the hall of the Thirty-seventh Regiment, on Broadway, between Thirty-fifth and Thirty-sixth streets. It is arranged with great taste, and will doubtless produce thousands of dollars for the desirable object for which it was designed. One of the chief attractions is a magnificent Floral Temple, of which we give an illustration on our first page. There are numerous tables in the room, profusely laden with fancy and useful articles of every description. Besides the tables supplied by private parties in this city, there is one belonging to the Turnverein, one from Hoboken, and one from College Point. On the premises might Mr. WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT made a very interesting address.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1870.

ANNEXATION BY CONQUEST.

WE have more than once remarked the profound regard for the public opinion of the world which has been constantly evinced by Germany during the war. Every word has been spoken and every act done as in the conscious presence of a great and just arbiter. There could be no more significant proof of the immense moral progress of the world, for it is a tacit admission that mere force conclusively settles nothing; that every result produced by powder and shot must be ratified by reason, or it will not stand. In all Count BISMARCK'S dispatches, therefore, there is a tone of calmness which is almost cruelly satirical upon the passionate rhetoric of the French declarations. His circulars to the German legations in various countries detail, the circumstances of his interview with JULES FAVRE has been published since our article last week was written. COUNT BISMARCK'S account of the interview, like that of JULES FAVRE, is, of course, ex parte; but it has an air of great probability. His statements, as he reports them, are precisely those which it was universally supposed would be made by Germany, and his corrections of certain representations of M. JULES FAVRE justify themselves. There can be little doubt that the substance of the previous is faithfully reported by COUNT BISMARCK.

There can be as little that they will be considered by public opinion not to have failed by reason of the extravagance of the German conditions. The primary topic was of necessity an armistice, and the terms proposed were not extravagant. The frontier that would be claimed as a condition of peace BISMARCK declared to abscess until the principle of conquest was publicly conceded by France. Whether this cession were to be absolute by right of conquest, or be referred to a vote of the inhabitants, he did not say. But he denied that the cede territory would humiliate France. It was a demand which France had always made, and it was a result of all modern wars; and France could not urge that the cession would dishonor her without denying that she has dishonored other nations. Indeed, if the argument and the precedent were with COUNT BISMARCK, But the Count did not, and, of course, could not, show how the absolute cession of territory and population would tend to that peace of feeling without which a treaty is but a truce.

"America," a very learned and able correspondent of the Evening Post, recently considered the whole subject of the plebiscite, laying aside the question of the wisdom of annexing any French territory, and assuming annexation to be essential to the peace of Germany and of Europe, he shows that we Americans have five times decided in our national history, that neither the people of Louisiana, of Florida, of California, nor of New Mexico were consulted, and Texas, as an independent State, was admitted by treaty. All territorial annexation, with very few exceptions, has been made without the plebiscite, and "America" therefore asks by what right a majority can determine the allegiance of the rest. There is undoubtedly a great deal of weight in such a question. But the actual question must be determined by the circumstances. Louisiana was undoubtedly an unfit French territory as it was ceded, just as Washington Territory is as much part of the domain of the United States as New York. But it would manifestly be unwise now for the government to lose that Territory by friendly cession in a time of peace than to be forced by war to cede New York.

But although it is undoubtedly true that annexation by conquest has been hitherto the rule, there is no question that it has not tended to the permanence of peace. Mr. SEWARD did not care to have a vote taken upon the island of St. Thomas. But when Denmark insisted, and the vote was as virtually unanimous as that of the Roman provinces recently, the proposed cession had a moral strength which nothing else could give. It is, of course, a perplexing question. But if the majority of the inhabitants of Alsace ought not to determine the allegiance of a minority, should the arms of an enemy determine that of the whole? Granting that a vote upon the subject is awkward, and in a certain sense inconclusive, is it not a very much more satisfactory method than a peremptory transfer? The latter is an assertion of one of the old rights of war, as they are called, which have been set aside by the development of the very public opinion of which we were speaking, and which protests against the mere will of the conqueror as a law for the conquered.

It is, again, in deference to this public opinion that COUNT BISMARCK has sent a dispatch from Versailles to the German ministers that the object of the military operations in France is not conquest, but such a new boundary as experience has demonstrated to be essential to the defense of Germany from French incursions. To this security Germany is entitled. The whole world agrees that she is not bound to continue exposed to French invasions and promenades to Berlin. But it is not upon this security that can be found in the total demolition of the fortresses; and that no "rectification of frontiers" or occupation of the expenses can do more than exasperate feeling until it produces another terrible war.

THE TAMMANY POLICY.

WE showed last week how it had become the duty of the Republican voters of the city of New York to throw their weight against the Tammany Ring by supporting the anti-Tammany Democratic nominations. Since then the Republican State Committee, at a meeting attended by twenty-four of the thirty-one members, and by a vote of twenty-two to three, have recommended that no City nominations be made by the Republican party, but that those of the independent or anti-Tammany Democrats be supported. On the following evening two Conventions of the party were held. That of the Administration Republicans, on certain approved the action of the State Committee, by resolving that the course recommended by it was the true policy of the party, under the circumstances. The other Convention, that of those who are called, from their action, Tammany Republicans, disapproved a resolution virtually severing the State Committee, which was finally referred, and a committee of conference with the other body was appointed. We do not suppose that the Administration party will recede, and the other, having made an apparent overture of harmony, will probably be content to nominate a full ticket of Republicans.

It is a wise old maxim in war to find out what the enemy wants you to do, and then avoid it with energy. The enemy is anxious that a Republican ticket shall be nominated in the city. It will divide the opposition and secure the victory of the Tammany Ring. Is it not enough for any Republican to say that the enemy is voting a party ticket upon which he is bent, or does he prefer the fact of the enemy's defeat? We in the city prefer the fact to the Tammany Ring. It is very powerful and very crafty and unscrupulous. And when a Republican discovers that the wish of the regular party of his party helps the Ring, ought he not to vote differently? Moreover, it is not a question to be decided by sharp dislike of the managers or advocates of the two policies. If a voter distrusts A, who is conspicuous upon one side, as much as he dislikes B, who is conspicuous upon the other, when he sees that Tammany prefers one of them, is it not enough to persuade him to vote for the other?

Every Republican knows that the hope of the Tammany leaders in the State and in New York by manipulating the vote in the city by fraud of every kind. Should they succeed they will press Mr. HOFFMAN'S Mr. HOFFMAN upon the next Democratic National Convention as the most available Presidential candidate, who is sure to carry the State, and secure the imposing array of electoral votes. They wish to use the State of New York as the lever to overthrow the Republican national administration, and they intend that the city shall be the fulcrum. Does any Republican wish to help them? If he does, he will of course do at this election precisely what the Tammany managers wish; that is, he will support the Republican city nominations, and by many he will vote for both—if his object is to strike at the very heart of the movement to turn over the national government to the party which controls the city at election—he will refuse to divide the opposition to the Tammany Ring.

PRUSSIA AND NEUTRAL RIGHTS.

IT is stated from Washington that the Prussian Government has contracted with Lord for the sale of arms and material of war in this country to France. The same remonstrance has been addressed to England, and apparently with damaging force, by the Prussian minister, who points out that the British Government has changed its ground upon this subject during the war, and that its present position is incompatible with its recent conduct. Upon the first point the Prussian minister has, of course, says that when complaint was first made of such shipment from England the reply was, that there could be interference only upon positive proof of the traffic; and that when such proof was offered the reply was, that the traffic was lawful. In the second place, he says that in the Danish-German war the British Government did prevent the exportation of arms and warlike stores intended for use against Denmark. This is certainly a statement of damaging force, if it be true. But there is, of course, something to be said upon the other side; and that is to be found in the circular of the British Foreign Office of August 11, 1870.

In that circular LORD GRANVILLE says, that "The steps taken by her Majesty's Government have been strictly in accordance with precedent, and with the principles by which neutral nations, including Prussia herself, have been guided in recent wars." And he adds, that no neutral power can decide what articles are to be held contraband of war, nor prevent their exportation; and that it is the duty of the belligerent to arrest them if they are likely to injure him. But LORD GRANVILLE confuses his case by stating that in the Crimean war Prussia herself could not prevent the passage of foreign arms through her territory to Russia, although she had forbidden it. What then? If a state is not bound to prohibit the exportation, as LORD GRANVILLE claims, why should it be anxious to prevent it? That he is correct in his statement of the British law is undeniable. "Mr. VERNON HARCOURT — said, during the Alabama debate, "An English merchant may manufacture cannon and all the implements of war for a belligerent, because there is no law to prevent it." The late amendments of the British statutes have by no means done away with it; and the claim of the Prussian minister, that the export of arms and material from England to France is a breach of neutrality, can not be sustained in view of the fact that the same facilities are offered to each belligerent, and that if the subjects of neutral powers violate the laws more than the other, it is, nevertheless, a rule adopted upon general grounds, and without regard to any particular country.

The position of this country upon the subject has been always uniform, and Prussia must be only to be entitled to our unrestricted traditional neutrality. Hostile expeditions and ships of war are not allowed to depart, nor to be fitted out, but arms and munitions, which can be of service only when they reach the territory of the belligerents, we freely sell and take the risk. Recently the case declared to a foreign minister at Washington, just at the beginning of the present war, that arms and warlike material of every description declared by the United States as articles of legitimate commerce by neutrals; and that during our late war great quantities of such articles were furnished by dealers in England, France, and Belgium to both parties in this country. It is very plain that if Prussia wishes our assistance to be furnished with American arms, she must stop them. The Prussian Government has declared such a law-name and agrees regard for the rights of neutrals that she can not hope to maintain a claim that war shall limit neutral commercial intercourse. If the neutral world may supply arms and material at its own risk to belligerents, nations will be more wary how they go to war. It is manifestly better than that it is for the advantage of civilization that the rights of neutrals shall be constantly enlarged.

PARTY SPIRIT.

MR. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, of Massachusetts, in accepting the Democratic nomination for Governor of that State, writes a very lively letter. He says: "Differing in that respect from my eloquent competitor [WENDELL PHILLIPS], I have, for thirty years past, wished to be Governor of Massachusetts very much; but having failed to discover the reciprocity of sentiment among a majority of my fellow-citizens, which is so desirable in such cases, I thought it would be wise for the Democracy to select a more attractive candidate." He adds that it would be absurd to insist upon refusing so small a sacrifice as that of allowing his name to be printed on the ballot of a party which is all that is expected of a Democratic candidate for Governor in that State. If the letter of Mr. ADAMS had ended here it would have been a good-humored part of the joke which he and every body else understand his nomination to be. But he proceeds to make certain assertions in regard to the Republican party and its policy, one of which will illustrate the value of all.

Mr. ADAMS says: "Above all, Sir, the Democracy intend to try for a new Union under what a radical Senator of the United States has called that revived and worm-eaten bequest of the fathers of the republic, 'the Constitution of the United States.'" Mr. ADAMS ought to remember that the first duty of an honorable partisan is to take care to ascertain the truth of charges that he makes; and the least care upon his part to know the fact would have apprised him that no radical Senator ever said what he quotes. It is an electioneering story, which, like that of the statement of a correspondent professing to report the substance of a speech of Senator CONKLING'S, and immediately upon its repetition in the World, where Mr. ADAMS probably saw it just as he was writing his letter, was promptly denied.

There are some things which even party malice might suppose that political opponents would not say. If in the days when Mr. ADAMS was a Republican, and PRESTON BROOKS assaulted Mr. SUMNER, it had been reported that Mr. EDWARD EVERETT, who was a political opponent of Mr. SUMNER'S, had said that Mr. SUMNER was served right, would Mr. ADAMS have gravely repeated the remark as authentic? Yet it was just as probable that Mr. EVERETT would have said it as that Mr. CONKLING would call the Constitution "worm-eaten and decayed."

FRANCE AND BALLOONS.

ANY close observer of the European war must have remarked that the truth of the situation has been constantly told by the Germans, and not by the French. During the battles at the end of August around Metz, and the series of operations which closed at Sedan, the reports from French sources were totally false, and the lies upon which Paris was fed are monstrous to remember. This French inability to tell the truth apparently continues. Whether is be that the new Government distrusts itself, and thinks that it is necessary to flit the French heart at all hazards, or wishes merely to produce a momentary effect upon general public opinion, whatever may be the case it is certain, it is painfully evident that it is necessary to disbelieve the French reports until they are confirmed.

Thus one morning recently it was announced from TOURS that BAZAINE had broken out of Metz, and was in triumphal victorious march through the German lines to join another French army; that the German force which had a day or two before taken possession of Orleans had been surrendered; while a sortie from Paris had driven back the whole line of the Germans, and had, in effect, raised the siege of the city. By one word, the entire situation was changed; and if the news were true, it was to be supposed that the next morning's intelligence would be that the Germans were in full retreat to reach the Rhine, and escape from France before they were annihilated. There was no such news, however, but in place a simple statement that the astonishing reports were untrue, that the Germans still held Orleans, that their position around Paris was substantially unchanged, and that BAZAINE was still in Metz.

Because the French have taken to balloons their news seems to be affected by the conveyance—it is all wind and gas. So tragical a matter as war is never offered to the support of material and moral chos into which a great nation has suddenly fallen. No man and no people of any character seems to be masters of the situation. Those who have placed themselves at the head of affairs shrink from seizing the people by the communistic hair, and they can not plead that the situation of the country renders it impracticable, for BISMARCK stated that in the negotiations with the interviewed in districts which the Germans command, and he would have granted an armistice for the purpose. The French authorities seem to dread the appeal to the people. The consequence is, that while industry is every where paralyzed—while the country is overrun by the enemy, and necessarily desolated—while city after city is falling into the enemy's hands, and his lines are fixed more and more firmly—while the confidence of the French soldiers and people in their military leaders is wholly destroyed, and the people themselves under the Italian jealousy, GARIBALDI—while the rhetorical proclamations of the Provisional Government only make the reader sigh, and the military operations seem the rapid, impossible, and resultless, there is the terrible consciousness that amidst all the bewildering confusion there is only a provisional authority, born of an emotion, and by its own acknowledgment not a Government which can bind the country, or which other Governments can fully negotiate.

No cheers for a republic, no denunciation of despotism, can do more than increase the confusion. If BAZAINE really had escaped from Metz, and were triumphantly marching to TOURS at the head of his victorious army, or had actually surrendered, and the remnants of their army were streaming across Eastern France—what should we be likely to see in a country full of blood and desolation and wrath?—labor paralyzed, and the laborer armed; somewhere a hysterical enthusiasm; self-constituted leaders of a people to await the legitimate organization of authority. One of the wisest of political thinkers, himself a Frenchman, DE TOCQUEVILLE, more than thirty years ago expressed a fear that France was tending to that most deplorable of conditions, a democracy under an absolute monarch; that is to say, a democratic state of society without an intelligent spirit of liberty. This was exactly the condition of France under LOUIS NAPOLEON, and it is this which has ruined the country. There is, apparently, the same confidence among Frenchmen left, and, so far as can be surmised from the reports of eye-witnesses and residents in that country, a great military chieftain could easily work his will.

That a republic might at last, and after a terrible struggle, reorganize France into a peaceful and progressive political society, is possible: but is a republic possible? When it was declared, remembering the manner in which it had been always betrayed hitherto, it seemed in the then apparent situation as if its chances were fair. And if there had appeared in the Provisional Government a republican man of heroic grasp, which could have plainly seen that the first act of the country must be the repudiation of the Emperor's war, as it had apparently repudiated the Emperor, and could have seen further that immense sacrifices at which France would unskillfully protest, were indispensable, and had had the ascendency to persuade the country to acquiesce, the world would have felt that there was hope of establishing and sustaining a popular system. But the French conduct of affairs has been a huge blunder. The sole thought has been to repel the invader by force of arms, and to denounce him as blood-thirsty and barbarous because he did not retire before the threat. We do not certainly blame the men in authority that they are not other than they are. We do not say that any man, or body of men, could have commanded the nation to a truly great and wise policy. The storm of popular feeling must, perhaps, be spent. But instead of that the actual situation must be confronted reasonably, and not rhetorically. In the mean while it is useless to prophesy, but equally useless to credit balloon news.

THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT IN OPERATION.

THE returns elections show that the colored vote is true to the party which proposed and carried the Fifteenth Amendment. It would be very strange if it were not so. Those citizens who have been so long disfranchised or disabled should vote against those who have fought and won their battle, and in favor of the party which has steadily derided and oppressed them, it would only prove how utterly degraded that oppression had made them. But it is not quite so strongly by ex-Governor Orr, of South Carolina, in the letter of the 15th of August, when speaking of the new vote in the Southern States, that we are glad to repeat what he said:

"The colored race is, and has been from 1867, nearly a unit for the Republican party, and have they acted unwisely or unpatriotically in their ardent devotion to the Republican party? Suppose our condition as a white race—were reversed; that we and our ancestors had been slaves for two hundred years; that a party had made war to give us freedom, that it had succeeded; that the same party had perilled its own supremacy by guaranteeing to us civil rights; and that, above all, the forfeit, the effectual weapon of preserving those rights, had been secured to us by solemn constitutional enactment by the very party which we were, in the face of all this, appealed to by those who had opposed all these great boons, to join with them in overthrowing the party of our deliverance and redemption, would any white man receive with patience any such proposition?" And Mr. ORR adds very truly and concisely, "I is strange the colored Republican should be cautious, and adhere with tenacity to his party? Can we justly hope to secure a wise political influence over him which we now constantly do in all the other relations and duties of life, until he is convinced that we intend in good faith to protect him equally with the whites, not only in his person and property, but in all his civil and political rights?"

These questions, so obvious to every sagacious politician, have, of course, suggested themselves to the Democratic party leaders in the Northern States. But they had so long prepared by pandering to the contempt and hatred of the colored population that they could not suddenly turn to flatter and cajole them without alienating their followers. They have, therefore, lost all chance of securing a considerable part of the new vote, and their aim is to bully it from the polls if they can. This was tried in Philadelphia at the late election, but the United States Marshal had made provision of military force which awed the ballots and protected the voters. In the city of New York, the World, the organ of what is calls themselves correspondents, openly suggests to the repeaters and ballot-stuffers to go to the polls. Such advice is, of course, to be expected from those who are used to carrying elections by fraud and violence, and who trade to ignorance and crime. But the honest voters are, fortunately, still in the majority, and although the present Mayor, like his predecessor, Mr. JOHN T. HOFFMAN, should strive to protect frauds, and the Governor—the same Mr. HOFFMAN—should sustain the MAYOR'S attempts, honest voting will still be practicable so long as the superior national authority is in Republican hands.

No good citizen, whose purposes are honest, will object to the most stringent supervision of legal voting, nor to the summary exposure and the severest punishment of illegal. But nobody of course, who believes the organ of the Ring, believes an honest election to be practicable under the Ring auspices. For what chance of a fair election could there possibly be from gentlemen who, as we are told by the World, "cut down below its level the rightful vote of the electors of HORATIO SEYMOUR?" If they cut down the vote for a candidate whom they do not like, they will certainly not hesitate to "pile it up" for one whom they favor. If the World is to be trusted, the honest voters are defrauded at the polls, and can not be protected. So the glad the World must be to know that the Government is resolved that they shall be!

WOMEN AND PEACE.

THE appeals of Madame DE GASPARIN and of Miss JULIA WARD HOWE, each published without co-operation, show that the sympathy of women is ceasing to be a passive emotion, and is becoming a practical and powerful incentive to action. Mrs. HOWE, in her address, published some weeks ago, invites the assembly of a congress of women to meet in Europe, and that they will not connive at war, but will insist that a peaceful solution of every difficulty be found. Madame DE GASPARIN presents a petition to be signed by women throughout Christendom, and presented to the belligerent governments, and to others, praying for a speedy peace. Wives and daughters, against the inevitable wrongs and irremediable sufferings of war. However mistaken they may be, they may assure that no such protest or congress could be effective, the suggestion is significant. It is another sign that women are moving to a decisive part, not only as human beings, but as citizens, in the conduct of affairs. But while they are still disfranchised and do not use their savage public combined protest could be more influential than private remonstrance. A protest with a vote behind it is very powerful. But the power of feeling is made now as earnestly as it could be under any circumstances.

What a mighty moral power to prevent war, by making the protest operative. At present every wife and mother and sister is aware that all her prayers and tears are mocked, as they inspire courage for a truly holy war. The universal protest of their hearts as to the bitterness of glory would be of effect if they who arms and marches away. That, indeed, could not be deepened nor increased. But if women cannot vote, they can say, "You shall be no war," in the same way that men say, "There shall be," the impulse from a universal relation would be equal. Long ribbons of names, which could not well be authenticated, could have but a vague and remote effect, but piles of ballots cannot be denied. And the instinct which impels two women in different countries, and without collusion, to propose to adopt the widowed and orphaned children of a dom to bear directly upon the subject, is the same instinct which is moving them toward an equal voice, as they have equally vital interest, in the conduct of human affairs.

NOTES.

THE statement that Secretary COX resigned for what are called personal or pecuniary reasons is entirely without foundation. He resigned for a different reason. He resigned because those who have the power to make the department a mere political machine would not allow him to exercise dent to the public service and to his own self-respect and conscientious duty. He left the retirement of the Secretary, like that of Judge HOAR, is another eloquent protest against the present political system. It is a system which both parties cling because it is profitable to politicians, although it is a disgrace to the country. The perplexity of the President, who is comparatively unfamiliar with politics, is natural. He is between two parties, each party accordingly and control, must be, of course, very great, and the President's previous process to advise frankly upon every question of party management is all the more embarrassing.

THE latest accounts from Europe before our paper closes indicate that a strong combined effort will be made by England, and perhaps by Russia as for an armistice in France, and with some probability of success. The Russian Chancellor's sagacity we have elsewhere spoken, see, of course, the disadvantage to them of a bombardment and the capture of Paris. But the Government of it they will be entirely justified in demanding its surrender, and, upon a refusal, in proceeding to extremities. But the situation of France is so forlorn, and the interest of the world in Paris is so great, that there is every desire of the Republican party for the country which always attends misfortune. The Republic is a fact and a representative of this feeling. He says that France is a chaos, and that Germany is a superbly and nobly organized nation. But it is possible to believe both too far. There is no reason in such a remark as the last, but it expresses a very general feeling. It is the consciousness of that feeling which has delayed the bombardment of Paris, and which makes an armistice possible.

IS a recent speech to prove the purity of the elections in the city of New York, Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR alluded to the draft in 1864, and spoke of "the absolute fairness and precision" of execution of our Union." But at the beginning of the war with so sacred a purpose Mr. SEYMOUR said substantially—and the saying was used against him with withering force by Daniel S. DICKINSON—that the Union should be dissolved rather than that slavery should be abolished. Mr. SEYMOUR'S speech is intended, like the proclamation of Mr. TWEED'S Mr. HOFFMAN when he was Mayor, to protect electoral frauds in the city of New York. Mr. SEYMOUR'S assertion of the purity of elections in this city is contradicted by the World, the office of which says that he personally knew the shameless frauds by which Mr. CASEY and Mr. HALL and Mr. WILLIAM M. TWEED cast votes. Mr. SEYMOUR'S own vote here in 1868; and by Mr. THOMAS J. CREAMER, now of Tammany Hall, and then out of Tammany Hall, who said last winter in a speech in the State Senate, carefully reported in the World, that the electoral system in the City of New York was "a corrupt as hell." Mr. SEYMOUR'S smooth generalities will deceive no one who remembers the assertions of his own party associates who live in the city, and are familiar with the Democratic methods of election.

ONE of the late foreties in the morning papers was that General BANKS, lying advertised to deliver a lecture upon the European war, was at the last moment induced to withdraw, because his sympathies were known to be with the French, and ex-Governor CLAFLIN, of New Hampshire, took his place. At first sight this news would be puzzling, as there is a tolerably free expression of opinion here by other gentlemen, and it is certainly difficult to see why General BANKS should not have that his sympathizers with France, if such is the fact. But in the papers of the previous day it was announced that the General had just been renominated for Congress, and the unavoidable inference is, that there must be a large number of voters of German descent among his constituency. But the matter was clearly managed. If he had been reported unwell, no ill consequences would have ensued. But the announce authoritatively in the papers that he was among French sympathies would seem to be as damaging as if he had said so in a lecture.

WE are very glad to know that we misspprehended the action of the friends of Woman Suffrage in Massachusetts, and very sorry if we shall have led any one into error. The representatives of the cause did not seek to traffic with either of the great party conventions, nor mean to make any bargain whatever. But before those conventions met the Woman Suffrage Convention resolved that it will not co-operate with any ticket who was not favorable to the political equality of women. The Convention, however, did address a request to both of the other conventions, requesting the recognition of that equality as an act of justice. We learn that the friends of the cause among the Republicans in Massachusetts are entirely satisfied with what has been done, and they "are opposing not the whole Republican party because it refused in the Republican Convention to commit itself to woman suffrage."

THE paragraph in the Pall Mall Gazette installing Senator MORTON, our new Minister to England, of which we have spoken, however, there are serious doubts, should be regarded as just what it is—the joke of an ignorant and irresponsible writer. Certainly it should not be allowed to affect in any degree the feeling of friendship toward England. Our own press is free, and we know how loosely the falsest stories are often told by it about England and English. Again, while it is essential only to avoid error. There is no more popular Buncombe in this country than "Kiss" at England, and we are very sorry to say it. The phrase is expressive of a dull and ignorant hostility; of the spirit which protests upon reminding our friends in that country with our enemies, and denouncing them all as selish Britishers. Of course there are selish Britishers, and we ought to pity them, and be thankful that there are no selish Englishmen; but on the other hand, there are Englishmen who are our true and sturdy friends. They are a great and controlling party in England; and why are we apparently always insist upon forgetting them? It was the morning after the speech of Mr. THOMAS in the New York that the paragraph from the Pall Mall was published. His speech and the paragraph fairly illustrate the two England, and we must clearly comprehend before we can be just in our feelings toward that country.

OUR friends the enemy are having a very rough paper time in Louisiana against General WOOD, a form of complicity in the slave-trade. Mr. MURRAY, the late United States Marshal for the district, asserts that when the General was a candidate for Lieutenant-Governor somebody from the Democratic committee him, and asked him to keep still upon the subject, as Mr. GREELEY had nominated General WOOD upon the Syracuse Convention. The Mayor of the city asks Mr. GREELEY if the messenger did not call at his request. Mr. GREELEY says that he remembers, "Yes, Mr. MURRAY has lied to you if he has told you any thing else." So far as we are concerned, Mr. MURRAY adds that he consented not to produce the evidence which would have so damaged General WOOD, because it is bad form and fellow because he may have been asked to be silent, and the evidence was conclusive. It was enough that it would have made the sense talk that it has now; and if a person came to the Marshal from the Tribune it was with the hope of keeping the discussion out of the canvass. That the evidence was materially fatal to General WOOD's case is entirely disproved by the fact that the whole subject was examined at the time by Judge SHIPMAN of the Interior Department, and the General most honorably exonerated. Mr. GREELEY, in another article, suggested that the secret of Mr. MURRAY'S hostility to General WOODWARD is that, as Assistant District-Attorney, the General interfered with some of the Marshal's plans for enriching himself by prize captures. However this may be, the attack upon General WOODWARD has entirely failed.

FOREIGN NEWS.

MILITARY OPERATIONS IN FRANCE.

UP to the latest dates, by balloon from Paris (October 28), the general situation within the walls of that city remains unchanged, except that there has been some improvement in the Provisions. It is reported that the garrison, consisting of cannon, is pushed forward with great dispatch, and that numerous batteries are drilled into position. Frequent sorties on the part of the garrison are reported. These sorties have for object the driving off and harassing the besiegers at their work, and accustoming the new soldiers to service, as the time has scarcely yet arrived when the garrison can be raise the siege by a general attack from within the city. Provisions are said to be still plentiful, and all the municipal squares and pleasure-grounds in the city have been converted into cattle-pens.

The German and French batteries is said to be so effective that the former have been unable to reply to the latter when bombarding the forts of the city. The forts are manned by the best gunners in the army.

Reports from the cities and provinces show that bands of sharp-shooters, in all parts of the country occupied by the enemy, are becoming more and more effective, and cause much annoyance and damage on the German lines of communication.

Accounts in regard to the destruction of the chateau of St. Cloud are contradictory. The Prussians have it in the French, and confess it is an act of Vandalism. The French say that the chateau was destroyed to deprive the world that the Prussians would not hesitate to sacrifice anything to their purpose. Whatever may be the motive, it was fired by the Prussians to conceal their depredations. The Prussians burnt all the town of St. Cloud except the public edifices and set treasures had disappeared before the fire broke out.

Four thousand French soldiers surrendered at Sedan, where October 1 and 120 others were among the sick of the victors. The Prussian force released by this surrender is said to number 25,000 men. It will move against some others of the northern fortified places.

The bombardment of Strasburg continues. The service of supplies, commencing October 20, resulted in the capture and destruction of 1,000 carts, 1,500 horses, 800 head of cattle, and 1,000 prisoners. The latter, clothing from shops and wine from cellars. The fighting is severe around the valley of the Lauter.

General Garibaldi has organized his command in the Vosges, consisting of three brigades, each of which is commanded by his son Menotti.

The efforts of Jules Favre to negotiate a reinforcement between France and Prussia have failed. The Count BISMARCK'S proposals, made through the American General, were said to be the payment of an indemnity of $1,000,000,000; the cession of Alsace, Lorraine, and Metz; the occupation for ten years, and then to decide by a plebiscite whether Germany should retain or abandon them, and eight a peace thereafter. It is reported that M. Jules Favre considered these terms as "humiliating," but that the Government expected them. Notwithstanding this rumor, it is stated in a Londondispatch of October 27 that the French envoys sadors at Tours and Berlin, in communication with those at Austria and Italy, are in favor of an armed intervention for an armistice.

The terms of capitulation on the Loire has issued a proclamation declaring that the main constitution of peace in the hands of the French Minister for Germany.

AN earthquake occurred on the 20th ult., which spread from the mountains of Utah County, Utah, to Lower Canada, and New England, to the coast. Dispatches were received from Montreal, Quebec, Syracuse, and other places in the interior of the State, along the line from Albany to Buffalo, and at Montreal and other Canada towns, and throughout the New England States. The shock lasted for a minutes past 11 o'clock, and lasted from half a minute to two minutes. At Montreal the shock was so severe that walls were rung in the public buildings, and judges precipitately left the court-rooms. At Quebec, the shock was more severe than in Montreal. The shock was also felt in Quebec, and the spire of St. Patrick's Church was shaken, the bells of which rang out. Similar reports from Canada to the shock was quite distinct.

Travel and Adventure.

PREPARED EXPRESSLY FOR HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNEY THROUGH ICELAND.

CHAPTER V.

Off for Mount Hecla.—Deserted by the Guide.—An Involuntary Halt.—Hospitable Reception.—A Conversation in Latin.—Strange Scene in a Church.—A Peasant Wedding.—Curious Marriage Customs.

LEAVING the wonderful plain of the geysers, described in the last chapter, M. Noël Nougaret, from whose interesting narrative these papers are prepared, continued his journey to Mount Hecla. This remarkable volcano is situated in the southwestern part of the island, and not many miles from the coast. The valleys which extend into this region from the sea have each its stream of water, fed by the copious rains which come from the condensation of the vapors that rise from the comparatively warm water carried thither from the Gulf Stream. This moisture causes the grass to grow wherever there is any soil; and the country is accordingly sparsely inhabited by peasants, who raise sheep and cattle and horses to the extent that the scanty vegetation will allow, though they derive their chief sustenance from the products of the sea.

Our traveler had been deserted by the guide which he had employed to conduct him to the region of the geysers, and left alone with the nine horses which constituted his "transportation." For on such expeditions as these it is necessary, it seems, to take one horse to carry the tent and its accessories, two more for provisions and baggage, and two saddle-horses—one for the guide, and one for the traveler himself. This makes five that are necessary for the actual work, and five more must be taken for a change, that the two sets may relieve each other, by hearing the burdens alternately during the progress of the journey, since no fresh horses can be obtained on the way to furnish relays.

Our traveler accordingly, after being thus deserted by his guide, proceeded to load his horses and prepare to continue his journey alone. He had an excellent map; for the Icelanders, though rude and simple in their manners, have attained to a much higher degree of cultivation than one would expect to find in so wild and inclement a region, and, in co-operation with the Danish government, they had constructed an excellent map of the country. On this map various little villages were laid down in the valleys which lay between the geysers and Hecla, at some of which he hoped to obtain a new guide.

SUPPER IN THE CHURCH.

AN INVOLUNTARY HALT.

The horses went on, as they were accustomed to do on such journeys, following each other in a long line, with their master at the head of it. They advanced in this way very steadily for some time, until they came to a hut, when they at once broke their ranks and began peacefully feeding upon the grass around it. They took it for granted, it seems, that there was to be a halt at every hut. There were dogs sleeping upon the top of the hut, which was roofed with turf, and had the appearance of a mound, with a rude opening for a door at one end, and presented a general appearance which might almost indicate that it was the abode of some wild animal.

The dogs received the traveler with a loud barking, which soon brought the only occupant of the hut, an old woman, to the door. Her husband was very probably at sea, fishing. It was theoretically night, though in the month of June, in these latitudes, there is no darkness at any hour. The woman, by pantomime, invited the stranger to come in and rest from his journey. He declined this invitation, as he wished to go to a certain village some miles farther on; but being thirsty, he pronounced the kolakaw word mefe, which was one of the few words of the language which he had in his very limited vocabulary. The woman immediately went into the hut, and brought out some milk in a calabash. When M. Nougaret had drunk he handed back the bowl to the woman, and she took a drink herself, as required by the rites of hospitality in such cases, as mentioned in Leviticus. He then offered her some pieces of Danish money, but she declined receiving any compensation. He then took from his pocket a kind of shawl-pin, with a large head spangled with glittering stones, and offered it to her. She received the gift with great apparent surprise and gratitude; and then M. Nougaret, gathering his troop of dogs from the roof and from the interior of the house, proceeded in a manner himself grateful at the door. But a small man, was wrapped in a long black coat or gown, and his face was nearly concealed under the visor of a cap which he wore, and by his beard below. Behind him, in a narrow passage-way, were seen a crowd of women and children, who had risen hastily, it seems, and pressed forward to see who had come.

The traveler selected the nearest of these, and succeeded finally in explaining to him in that language—though with some difficulty, on account of the difference of pronunciation—what he was, and wherefore he had come. As soon as the new comer understood this, his face seemed greatly pleased with the arrival of their visitor, and all united in giving him a most cordial and affectionate reception, as if he had been an old friend.

It occurs, according to the statement of our author, that these solitary churches are not exclusively devoted to purposes of worship, but are also used from time to fulfill various other functions, especially those connected with the rites of hospitality. In this case the priest was at once conducted to the church, and preparations were made for his accommodation there, while the priest's wife, in order to make room for his efforts, began to take away the various articles of clothing for her family which had been kept there. A supper was soon prepared for him, the table being set in the open space near the pulpit, and the minister himself keeping him company while he was eating it, while all the household, together with some of the neighbors, assembled as spectators in the pews.

After supper the table was cleared, and a bed was made up in the place of it. When all was ready the family and the visitors withdrew, and the traveler, after saying the usual prayers, lay down and occupied himself for a time, before he went to sleep, in looking through a window near his bed at the objects blooming in the moonlit yard, and musing on the singularity of his situation, until at length he fell asleep.

When he awoke the sun had of course been up for a long time, rising as it does in this latitude and at this season soon after six o'clock. When he opened the church door he found that all the family of the minister were up and at work, body that looked so like death as the dim rays of the lantern fell upon it. She saw him place his hand upon Judith's heart; she heard his murmured words of thanksgiving as he found that she yet lived; she saw him put the hair back from the forehead with a tender touch; she saw him strong over and kiss the pale brow, ere he lifted the slight figure in his arms and bore it to Mr. Gray's carriage; she heard him speak a few low words, and there was something in his voice that she had never heard before.

The wheels rolled away in the distance, and Faith got up, went home, and to bed. She had saved a life—that was all: for the next day Judith's home was found in the bottom of the ravine.

The next morning Faith was paler than usual, and there were dark circles about her eyes.

"Mother," she said, "if you are willing, I will put the baby in her carriage, and take her up in the woods. I can sew just as well there as here, and—I can't breathe this morning."

Mrs. Harris looked at her in some surprise.

"Go, if you want to," she answered. "But I expect the baby'll get all strung up by the mosquitoes."

Faith went, nevertheless; and before long Kenneth Marston joined her. He did not speak at first, but held out his hand silently, and looked at the patient little face very much as one might look at a pictured saint.

At last he said:

"These are to you last night, Faith, when I found Judith and took her away?"

"I was—there," said Faith, hesitating, "on the other side of the stump."

"And you did not speak to me—would not let me thank you? Oh, Faith!"

She did not answer, but her face was hidden in her hands. He removed them with gentle violence, and held them close prisoned.

"Judith has told me all about it," he whispered. "You have saved and aided me, and how you saved her from certain death. You know where they found the horse?"

Faith nodded, shudderingly.

"She wants to know you better, 'he went on. "She told me to bring you to her to-day, for she is not able to sit up, and she wants to thank and bless you."

Faith shook her head.

"You won't refuse, Faith. It is not like you —you who have given her life. It was for that I sent you this," he added, slipping a costly ring upon her finger as he spoke.

Faith looked at it and hid it in his hand again, while her face grew white as ashes.

"I do not wish to be paid for what I did," she said, while her lips trembled painfully.

"Paid! Faith, she never dreamed of such a thing. How could she? She sent the ring simply because she could not come to you herself. She said, 'It means less than my simplest word, Kenneth. But place it on her finger, and beg her to come to me.' She has the gentlest, truest heart, Faith. Do not misjudge her."

A shade of color had stolen back to Faith's face. But as these words it blanched again to the very lip.

"I can not wear your wife's ring," she said, presently, in a low, self-restrained voice. "It is impossible. But tell her I am glad that I was able to be of service to her, and that I hope there are many years of happiness in store for you both."

"My wife—my wife's ring!" exclaimed the young man, detaining her as she was about to leave him. "My wife! Why, what do you mean, Faith?"

Her eyes flashed, then fell as they met his.

"I mean that I saved your wife's life last night, Kenneth Marston, and—I want to go home now. I am tired."

She looked so, poor child!

"But, Faith, dear Faith!—and he twined one arm about her waist, while he tried to turn her face toward him—"look at me and listen to me. Judith Grant and my brother Hal are to be married as soon as he comes back from Europe, that is. They have been engaged these two years. Did you not know it?"

What could our little Faith do but to shake her head, while the soft color went and came upon her cheek, and her heart fluttered beneath his hand like that of a frightened bird.

Kenneth Marston read the sweet face for an instant. Then clasping her closely, he kissed her lips.

"Faith, I love you, and you only!"

And the baby looked on in wide-eyed wonder.

ITALIAN PEASANTS.

A CONSIDERABLE NUMBER of the non-readers in Italy are good story-tellers and reciters of ballads, and some of them make what is called poetry on their own account. This is particularly the case in the south and in some of the central provinces, where education of a practical kind has (until recently) been much neglected. Where schools flourish, home philosophy, sometimes called mother-wit, is generally found to be on the decline. Old women lose their importance; old men look to their sons and daughters, and not to the priest, for instruction. No more pensive, brooding over the old classics, make a reputation as local poets; no more village sibyls thunder forth anathemas in blank verse, or hit their children, or their children's children, to sleep with cradle-songs in seventy or eighty verses, interspersed with Litanies and Ave Marias. To find such customs nowadays you must go to secluded spots, far away from the track of the schoolmaster; to mountains and valleys where the priest is still supreme; to villages suspended from the craggy like eagles' nests, and supposed (but not proved) to have been built at the breaking up of the Roman empire by feudal chiefs or robbers, who were making war on their sovereign. It would almost appear as if poetry of a certain class can not exist in an enlightened age. Ivy looks best on a ruin; ballads do not flourish in an age of newspapers. Perhaps it is because ballads, being in one sense an inferior kind of newspaper, are driven out of the market by the real article. Look at education, what it is doing in Italy; how it is breaking the soil (like a large steam plow), and preparing the country for a new harvest! But, in addition to improving the institutions which beset its path, it removes many beautiful things; not alone the weeds of ignorance and superstition, but the wild flowers of tradition and poetry. And these are the sights which one sees in Italy in the early days of the hanasmi of Naples swept away, or forced to become honest members of society; the gondoliers of Venice compelled to be civil and properly controlled by the authorities; the brigands of Calabria and the Roman States either imprisoned as enemies to the pifferari and wandering minstrels—poor peasants, with their wives and families, who used to stay in every town and way-side shrines and in front of the pictures of the Virgin Mary—sent to the reformatory or the work-house. It is impossible to be a decent some of the old customs and traditions which are being destroyed along with them stories and abuses.

Tuscany and Lombardy, as well as Naples and the Roman States, contain many of the secluded spots above alluded to, "spots" composed of villages, and even small towns, where newspapers are unknown, books a forbidden rarity, and candles (tallow, wax, and composite) highly esteemed as articles of religious luxury. The country of these places are still in the sixteenth century, and they may, women, and children, and his or her conscience in the hands of the local priest. Soul-money, or a tax on dead people, is levied, and the priest, or his deputy, who is raised on sin, indulgences (or permission to sin) are bought and sold in secret, and people are taught that the wages of sin is death, as stated in the Scriptures, but absolution and eternal life. Such are the dark spots scattered over the great bulwark of the Church of Rome. When these fall off the Pope may begin to despair; but so long as these remain blackening, he may, so long as they remain ignorant and superstitious—there will be no progress or change of tactics on the part of the priesthood, either as regards soul-money for the dead, or sin-money for the living, or the worship of the Madonna throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Among the most beautiful and touching parts of the peasantry is the belief in the advocacy of little children—babes, who die as soon as they can be baptized, or as soon after baptism as is consistent with a belief in their entire innocence and purity. Children who die young are called "advocates," or avvocati, because they are said to go to heaven without passing into purgatory, and plead for their parents and relations at the right hand of God. Many old women (chiefly grandmothers), and not a few fathers and mothers, have been convicted of compassing the deaths of children, not wickedly or maliciously, but in a pious, God-fearing sort of way, in order to have "friends in heaven" when their time comes. Do not suppose that they murder the children. Nothing of the sort. They simply let them alone, and keep the doctor at a distance. If they are ill they say the hand of God is upon them. If friends interpose, and insist on something being done, they mutter a Latin prayer, and resign themselves to what they are pleased to call the "wishes of the Almighty." I have known cases where mothers have prayed that their innocent little children might die during illness, and cried bitterly when the coffin was being carried out of doors. But such cases are not frequent.

FRENCH PRISONERS FROM SEDAN.

THE surrender of the splendid army of Marshal M'Mahon at Sedan, by order of the Emperor, was the most terrible military humiliation ever inflicted upon a great nation. Some of the incidents of the French generals since declared that there was no necessity for it, and that, had their advice been followed, the stain upon the French honor might have been averted. The picture which we give on page 708 shows a large detachment of prisoners, after their surrender, halting for refreshment under the guard of their Prussian captors.

FLIGHT OF FRENCH PEASANTS.

ONE of the saddest features of the war in France is the destruction of small villages by the Prussians. It is in some cases, perhaps, a "military necessity"—a phrase which, however, may be made to excuse every sort of military outrage—and in others an act of vengeance for the shooting of an officer or soldier by an exasperated peasant. More than a score of such villages, which a few weeks ago were the happy homes of quiet industry and rural comfort, have been given to the flames and totally destroyed. The illustration on page 712 will give our readers a vivid idea of the misery thus brought upon the peasantry, who are compelled to fly from their homes with what little they can carry away in their arms or in hand-carts. It is one of the worst effects of war that those who are least responsible for it are always the severest sufferers from its ravages. While NAPOLEON lives at ease in the luxurious Château of Wilhelmshöhe, served by King WILLIAM'S own chief of cuisine, the hapless subjects are driven out into the fields and highways from their blazing homes, to die of exposure and starvation.

THE NEW SUPERINTENDENT OF POLICE.

MR. JAMES JACKSON KELSO, who has been promoted from the position of Chief of the Detective Office to that of Superintendent of the New York Police, is a native of this city. He was born in the Seventh Ward, October 31, 1835. His father, for whom he was named, was one of the best-known New York police, and highly respected by all who came in contact with him. The son, JAMES, being a bright and intelligent lad, was given all the educational advantages which were within his father's means. In due time he graduated from Public School No. 7, and subsequently from the Free Academy. He then entered the great oil house of JOSIAH MACY & SONS as a clerk; but after a short time took a position in the Register's office, where he remained for several years, under Registers DOANE and MINER, passing through the various grades to be a Principal Deputy. He then left the office, and on the 23d of January, 1861, was appointed a patrolman of the Metropolitan Police. He did not, however, go upon post duty, but was assigned to the office of Chief Clerk HAWLEY, and placed in charge of the record of arrests. About a year later he was transferred to the detective office, then under charge of Captain JOHN S. YOUNG. He remained doing detective duty until the retirement of Captain YOUNG, when he was placed in charge of the office, being made Sergeant April 9, 1869, and Captain on the 24th December, 1869.

Through all his police experience the new Superintendent was accounted a faithful and vigilant officer, and a shrewd, able, and successful detective. While in charge of the office he displayed administrative ability of a high order, and the training of his whole life has been such as to fit him admirably for the duties of the position to which he has been called. Personally he is said to be one of the most popular men in the Department, and he enters upon his new service with the confidence and good wishes of all parties. His portrait will be found on page 710

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE proprietor of a forge, not remarkable for his correctness of language, but who by honest industry had raised a comfortable independency, being called on at a social meeting for a toast, gave, "Success to my forge!"

A fat French lady despairingly says: "I am so fat that I pray for a disappointment to make me thin. No wonder then the disappointment came than the mere apparition of a traveling thinner gives me such joy that I become fatter than ever."

A Connecticut fisherman one day hailed his hook with a live frog. After patiently waiting some time for a bite, as he chatted with a friend, he found that his lively bait had swum ashore, and was sitting quietly on the rock by his side. He wound up his line and went home.

A thin, cadaverous-looking German, about fifty years of age, entered the office of a health-insurance company in Philadelphia the other day, and inquired: "Vell, dis man in vat business do people's lifes?" The agent politely answered, "I attend to that business, Sir." "Vell," said my byes, "vat you charge?" "Different prices," answered the agent; "from three to ten dollars a year; pay ten dollars a year and you get ten dollars a week in case of sickness." "Vell," said Mynheer, "I vant to see dollers rert." The agent inquired his state of health. "Vell, I vas sick von day last year, and I vas sick two, two hours a day, and a doctor was he cum'd de nothing more cost for me." "If that's the state of your health, re turned the agent, "we can't insure it. We only insure persons who are in good health." At this Mynheer trotted up in great anger. "You must think I's a pig fool! Vot you think I come pay you ten dollars for nothing? Do you think me vas I vas?"

APPROPRIATE PLACE FOR GOOD POKE.—On the Rhine.

IN Chicago they define a miser as a "philanthropist who, knowing money to be the root of all evil, secures himself for the good of his neighbor."

BAD TASTE.—Assafœtida.

When are soldiers like writers for the press?—When they charge by the column.

AN old "stager" of Salem was compelled by his worthy spouse to "join the cold water army," which he did, promising never to touch a drop except in sickness. He has never been well since.

THE sign of a pork-butcher in a French provincial city reads, "Batta, Jan., slaughters hogs like his father."

AN apprentice, one day, after dinner, deliberately stepped up to his master and asked him what he waited his services at per day. "About sixpence," said his master. "Well, then," said the boy, putting his hand into his pocket and drawing out some copper coin, "here's a penny gift on this occasion."

A ridiculous story is going the rounds of the country that Mr. Beach had a young woman arrested the other day for stealing an egg.

A Michigan census-taker came across a man who had been married five years, but had never inquired his wife's Christian name. He put down "Mrs. Jim?"

"IF winnin was ta vote, wouldn't every man on em go out quarterin in them vast wes their husbands and kin be? I put it to ye, wouldn't my Wife deshrain (for wone) take a sort of Haughty pride in leavin in a vote wat shook kounter-balance & make void (& without no effects) the ballot wat I had? Oh, & wat I know was a Goin to save the kuntry from Ruin and kaos? I ask, wouldn't she do it, even if I stole over her Solemn form, & was fetchin my Eye to bear on her every movement, all The while? I tell ye she Would."

THERE is a poor fellow in Bangor, Maine, who says "it's working between meals that's killing him."

OUR MODERN FALSTAFF REVIEWING HIS ARMY.—[SEE PAGE 714.]

FALSTAFF.—My whole charge consists of slaves as ragged as Lazarus, and such as indeed were never soldiers, but discarded serving-men and revolted tapsters. No eye hath seen such scarecrows. Nay and the villains march wide between the legs, as if they had fetters on: for, indeed, I had the most of them out of prison.—Shakspeare, slightly varied.

"ALSTAFF REVIEWING HIS ARMY.

MR. NAST'S striking cartoon on page 713 is unusually not a fancy sketch, and scarcely a caricature. Every New Yorker will recognize its truthfulness at a glance. Only those who have not visited our city in recent times, since it fell under the domination of the Ring, need to be informed the municipal authorities maintain a vast army of loafers, ostensibly for service under the Department of Public Works, but really for political purposes, and chiefly for repeaters' work on election-day. The ingenuity required to make a show of employing these fellows is also cleverly described in the New York Times of October 11, in an article headed "The Paradise of Bagmen:"

"There is familiar military movement known as marking time without advancing. Somebody who wants to see a similar process conducted with pickaxes and shovels need only to inspect during the present working-hours of the day the labors of a body of the Ring's political friends under the charge of the City Inspector. Here may be seen a few scores of naturalized citizens, whom the municipal authorities have chosen to appoint, engaged in an honest endeavor to distribute gravel over a number of Parks and pleasure-drives which have received a more than sufficient dose of it for this year at least. The City Hall knows that time is money, and therefore it supplies its workmen with implements which are well suited to find how little a spade may, in particular circumstances, be made to carry. The amount of energy that may be expended by eight men in turning over a shovel's efforts to fill a cart with gravel when the reflective lounger by the City Hall like a new resident in natural philosophy, is a matter of curious speculation. The entry Regiment was not selected to do this particular task for the reason that it was the newest department of the great Ring effort in front of the City Hall, but because the Chief Commissioner of Works knew the requirements of the situation well. It will organize their force with a view to getting the work lazily finished. Electric-day, with its fierce sunshine, will find each of these patriots resolved to recognize at least five votes for HOOWEY, and the probabilities are that given a fair day's wage for no appreciable day's work.

At stated intervals during the day the sound of the bell is rung for lunch, and the gangs march off to the refreshment-stands. We have not been able to learn whether the Commissioner has made any provision for the precious grass should it be trampled beyond the daily limit by the Park. Carried attention, however, might reveal the fact that the present republican Park Board has intended to familiarize the employes of Mr. TWEED with the pleasant manner in which they will hereafter be able to answer to, 'Leave not to-day, but to-day, ought to be the motto adopted in the Department of Public Works. The shining example which it presents of a successful application of this principle will be found to aid another to its many claims to public consideration, and we shall be to-day, and we shall be ready to-last some items of the price we pay for our cumbersome city government."

THE WATCH ON THE RHINE.

We reproduce this week, on page 717, the translation of this popular German song, which appeared in our columns some weeks ago, and which gives the force and spirit of the original more closely than any other version that has been under our notice. Until recently it was supposed that the poem was called forth by the present war between Germany and France. This, however, is not the case. Germany is indebted for this song to the war-cheap of 1840, not 1870. It has now been ascertained that "The Watch on the Rhine" was written in the year 1840, a few months later than the famous "Rhine-Song," by NICOLAUS BECKER; and its author, DR. SCHNECKENBURGER, a native of Thalheim, Würtemberg, who, a young man of twenty or twenty-one, was then living in Bonn. The song has been set to music several times; but only one tune—the one now universally adopted—ringing through Germany and into France, from the coast fires on the Baltic to the bivouacs of the Crown Prince of Prussia beyond Châlons—has become popular. It owes its origin to KARL WILHELM, formerly Capellmeister at Cöthen, Rhenish Prussia, where he died a few back as some years before 1850. KARL WILHELM, the composer, now a man of about fifty years, is living (although not in very good health), to earn the fruits of the sudden popularity of his tune. His name is on every lip, and his illustrated papers give his portrait, public subscriptions in his favor are successfully going on, and the Queen of Prussia has sent him a splendid medal in acknowledgment of his merits. She had intended to confer the same honor on the poet, but it was found upon inquiry that poor SCHNECKENBURGER had been dead more than twenty years. His portrait and that of KARL WILHELM, together with the music to which the words of this spirited poem are sung, will be found on page 717. The picturesque sketch underneath represents a Prussian band playing this truly national air at the head-quarters of "Our Fritz" in France.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE brilliant autumn foliage, a crowning glory of October, has been unusually beautiful in and about this season. Walking or driving in the country, traveling by rail or by boat, the observant lover of the maple, oak, and of scores of other forest trees, has seen mingling in the contrast with evergreens the wild wining vines. It seems really to be regretted that in the balmy October days, so mellow with soft sunshine during the delicious Indian summer, toward November, most of the day-boats, which make bay and river lively by sunhammer, should be withdrawn. Yet, one great title of travel is stayed; but the more summer tourist never dreamed of the attractions of melodic to those who journey after autumn's hue has tinged the landscape, as it does the bosom and ear of the steamers which still leave the city late in the afternoon, or a mid-day excursion on one of the little boats plying between various points on the river, gives an enchanting view of that far-famed scenery. The Highlands must be seen in their full splendor to be appreciated—not even in their fresh green June robes are Storm-King and Anna-Cock Hill more striking when enfolded in their coats of many colors. What matter if the sunshine often disappears, and heavy shadows fall upon the mountain's brow? The gathering clouds are proud, and, perchance, the tears that burst from them may throw a rainbow over the scene. Watching the ever-varying clouds, which with their changes beautifully change the mountains also—watching the river, now densely white with encircling fogs, now glimmering in the sunlight—watching all the bright landscape, which alters like a kaleidoscope under the eye—the delicious days pass dreamily away, leaving the mind touched and softened by that subduing influence peculiar to autumn.

Rumors are rife that several artists have been prohibited access to the picture-galleries in the Vatican, in consequence of their having taken part in the Inopolar demonstrations at Rome. The Italian Liberals complain against this, and declare that the galleries of the Vatican must be regarded as national property.

M. Ollivier is preparing a work in two volumes for publication. The first volume will bear the title, "The Revolution," the second that of "The Empire."

Curious, if true, is the report that, while Jules Favre and Count Bismarck were trying to find a basis of negotiation, Victor Mollue was seated in a corner reading "Uncle Bertl."

The origin of the word Silhouette is curious, and may be new to our readers. M. Silhouette was Finance Minister in Louis XV.'s time. He was famous for his made large reforms in the revenue, till, touching the personal expenses of the king, he was dismissed. He made him the most popular man in France. Every thing cheap was a la Silhouette, and the black profile portrait, just then come into vogue have preserved the name to the present time. Another curious relic of Kœnewka has exhibited the finest skill and purest workmanship. The collection called the "Illustrated Night's Dream" are exquisite creations, delicate and full of bottine the play. Another, the "Illustrated Gotche's "Faust" in the same manner. The book will will surely be a favorite. The Kœnewka Publication, in the style of their beautiful edition of Shakespeare's fairy creation. The text will be that of Translation.

During the first twenty days after the commencement of the war 185,000 Prussians passed through Berlin. The Prussian capital has 1,000 confectioners, 800 dietary refreshments, and also with 8,000 bottles of wine, 110,000 large glasses of beer, 60,000 bottles of lemonade, 64 bottles of Jamaica rum, 220,000 cigars, and 52,500 packages of tobacco.

The arrangements made by government for observing the transit of Mercury, on November 9, are complete. Any approach of storms, will be most useful. It is the design also to have the astronomical observations of the existence of a storm at any place being ascertained, in advance of the new department of Meteorology. Information of it may be communicated by telegraph in advance of the movement. Whenever experience has certainly determined what may be regarded as of fair service to the country, the promulgation of approaching storms, signal-stations will be established along the coast, the necessary instruments will be provided, and signals will be displayed, announcing the probable approach, with other information which may be possible.

It is a curious fact that every person thinks that there is no danger of musket, revolver, or any firearm going off accidentally when it is not loaded. Moreover, he is always certain that no gun is left in a safe place where it cannot be found by women or boys. Yet accidents are constantly occurring. The other day, in Williamsburgh, a boy was shot dead with a charged loaded musket belonging to an elder brother. While playing with it he discharged it into the abdomen of his little sister of seven years old, and killing her instantly. Such a sad tale needs no comment.

The London firemen have received false alarms of fires in consequence of the aurora borealis, which has appeared several nights during the past few weeks. The aurora has been very brilliant in this country also; but, in general, our people care very little of the sky so long as nothing falls in the aurora and a fire.

The banking-house of Drexel, Harjes, & Co. removed from Paris to Geneva some little time ago. They were the only bankers of Paris who continued to pay out the full amount of gold to their customers, without premium. Their action has been highly commended by our removal; and the house still ever be held in honorable esteem by American travelers.

"Divorce without publicity, and for a small charge," is a notice which has been published recently in Parisian papers. A certain class of lawyers have given expression to this luminous idea. Now a divorce is being made to put an end to the fraud which has been so notoriously prevalent in Paris. Now, the Supreme Court of Chicago has adopted orders providing that in all divorce suits hereafter instituted the complainants must publish in full the bill of complaint, or their solicitors must file written authority with the clerk before the decree can be had. Publication is the advertisements of the kind referred to appear in the papers, such publication will be taken as will tend to prevent its repetition.

One of our daily newspapers has commenced the regular announcement of divorces in its columns. "Divorced," "Divorced," "Divorced," is the error in which these important particulars appear.

Over six thousand emigrants landed in New York during the week ending on the 15th inst. Of these were one hundred and twenty Swedes, who are to form a colony near Fond du Lac, Wisconsin.

The long-continued bombardment of Strasbourg resulted in much destruction of life among the civil population, as well as among the garrison. The library, also, which contained many rare and valuable books, was entirely destroyed. A large picture-gallery and the Museum of Natural History shared the fate.

Since the death of Charles Dickens the statement has frequently been made that the author left no clew to the unfolding of the "Mystery of Edwin Drood," and that nothing could be given to the curious reader beyond this fragment of a story apparently most artistically plotted, and so remarkably broken off. This does not seem quite correct. Although no written notes have been found respecting the further development of the tale, or the solution of the "mystery," and any attempt to complete it by a different hand would have been unwelcome to the public, yet some authentic indications appear to have been left by the author. He tended to give the story, and these should be furnished to the readers of the fragment. Accompanying the edition of "Edwin Drood" published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers is a fac-simile of the vignetted cover, designed, probably, by the same artist who furnished the illustrations to "Edwin Drood," and in which the course of the story is evidently prefigured. An English reviewer of the opinion that, as several of the scenes in the actually completed parts are distinctly represented on the cover, the drift of those that are not have been more or less explained by Mr. Dickens to the artist who designed them for him. Any such explanation, if given, the artist would greatly assist the imagination of the reader, if they were only added to the fragment. In this case the importance is extremely interesting, in connection with the story. A fac-simile accompanies the article.

Worth, the famous man-milliner, removed his establishment some time ago from Paris to London. Many ladies, fearing that silks and velvets will attain a fabulous price in the near future, are purchasing to an extravagant amount.

A novel surgical operation was recently performed upon General Kilpatrick, our late Minister to Chili. For two years past he has been suffering from a swelling in the knee. He found himself obliged to return to this country for medical advice. Physicians decided that he was suffering from a white swelling, and decided that he was suffering from a white swelling, and decided upon amputation. At that time the tumor protruded outwardly as large as a hen's egg. Recently it was much increased in size. A surgeon was built an inch over to the left, making the effort to talk the tumor with the knife painful.

General Kilpatrick was placed under the influence of chloroform. Three incisions were made—one was inserted in the tumor. A powerful electric battery was then applied in full force to the swelling. When the battery was removed the patient remained quiet under the influence of the ether. In half an hour the swelling began to diminish, and soon disappeared entirely. Miss General Kilpatrick recovered consciousness after the operation was over. She cried and threat, but the "great lump" had gone. The operation seems to have been entirely successful.

Dr. F. V. Hayden, United States geologist, recently visited Colorado for the purpose of examining the Georgetown silver mines, and the country adjacent. He has been absent about one year in search of a velop an amount of mineral wealth that will place Colorado among the prominent bullion-producing States of the Union. At the Paris Exposition of 1867 the Colorado exhibit was the finest on record.

A persistent adherence to the following rule is said to be an effectual cure for stammering: Keep the teeth close together, and before attempting to speak inspire deeply; the pause will give time for quiet utterance. The very slight practice the hesitation will be relieved. No spasmodic action of the throat or face must be permitted to separate the teeth when speaking.

CHAPTER XXIX.

IN THE COURT-HOUSE.

It is presumed that the experience of the public mind to make us all philosophers, and to abolish the morbid interest which mankind at present feels in the various issues of life and death. They hold it weakness that we should become excited by the prospect, or enthralled by mystery, and prophesy a future when intelligence shall reign supreme, to the extinction of the vulgar passion for amusement. In the mean time, however, the sympathetic hopes and fears of humanity remain pretty much as they have been within the living memory—and one of the greatest treats that can be provided for the popular palate is a criminal trial. How many times a-week—nay, this should be the case; the courts of law are free, and a sight that can be seen for nothing is of itself attractive—how are we are, all of us, not lost long our time and money too. Again, the second popular delusion is the most popular with those to which the denouements can not easily be guessed; and in the court-house we see action and motion mixed with the varieties of the jury and the sentence of the judge—a matter of serious importance to all of us. Love and hatred, theatres and books are rare the passion for such scenes is proportionally stronger, and perhaps there is no greater event which so delights even the agricultural interest—speaking socially, and not politically—as the advent of the Judges of Assize.

At Cross Key, at all events, there was nothing to be inferred in the whole neighborhood" and the case which above all others was canvassed, and prejudged, and discussed in every way all sorts of hands—from the mahogany one in the dining-room at Cross Key Park to the deal tripod which held the joint of meat at the cook-shop next door—was that of Richard Yorke, the young gentleman-painter, who had run away with the daughter and heiress of Gerrish's boarded store. The rumor had got about that he had almost run away with her before also, and this intensified the interest immensely. The whole female population, from the high-sheriff's wife down to the woman who had the pork-stall in the market-place, was agog to see this handsome young Lochinvar, and to hear his story, and to pronounce on his (clandestinely) betrothed, who was known to have been subpœned for the defense.

There were two distinct theories of this prisoner to be had for nothing. He was a nobleman in disguise; he was the illegitimate son of the prime minister; he was indirectly but immediately connected with royalty itself; he could speak every European language (except Polish), and painted landscapes like an angel; he had £20,000 a year in hand, and was expecting for him to come of age, which carried with it half the representation of a Whig borough; he had not a penny to his name, and was only supported himself in luxury by skillful forgeries; young as he was, he was a married man, and had a wife (three times his age) alive. All these particulars were insisted upon and denied forty times a day. The least scraps of trust-worthy intelligence concerning him were greedily devoured. The turnpike-man who had opened gate to let him through on the night he came to the jail was cross-examined as to his appearance and demeanor. The rural policeman of the district (who, of course, never had a chance of seeing him) was treated to pots of ale, and suddenly found himself the best of company. The Castle at Cecil-h. was thronged by local topers, who, under pretense of being attracted by the scenery, came to stare at the prisoner's window. He returned to Cross Key with marvelous stories of her charms. As the time drew on the applications for admittance to the court-house made the life of the under-sheriff a burden, and caused the hearts of his subordinates (who got the half-crowns) to sing for joy.

The unhappy Richard was wholly ignorant of all this excitement. He was first carried the court-house to himself, so he often did, he only beheld a crowd of indifferent persons, who took no more attention to his own case than to that of Halifour, or any other that might follow the particular. He had been housed taken out in custody, and carried in some conveyance, such as he had arrived in, through the gaping street; but he had not seen it. He ordeal gave him no uneasiness. Those who saw him would forget him the next moment, or confuse him with some other in the same wretched plight. His mind always revealed from such reflections, as comparatively trivial, to the issue of the trial which, in fact, that thought might be said to be constant, though with the intruding of an occasional and melancholy it, like light clouds that cross the moon. As to the details of the scene of which he was about to be the principal actor, he knew nothing; for the warders never opened their lips to him, except officially, and Mr. Richard had never happened to come to grief in the course of his professional practice in that particular locality before.

But he had a notion that the day of trial was Friday, though situated in so out-of-the-way a spot, was a much considered one for the sessions. It brought in very highest principles of architecture, as connected with the administration of the criminal law. The prisoner was not aware of it for trial at all, but was conducted by an underground passage into the court-house itself—called into question by the court of, for a flight of steps, with a trap-door at the top, led straight into the dock, in which he found his appointed place like a dickie-box, but much more to his own astonishment than to that of the spectators.

In the midst of the unhappy Richard thus confronted, wholly unexpectedly, with a thousand eager eyes? They drowned him on the right hand and on the left, before him and behind him; they looked down upon him from the galleries above with a fixed gaze that was painful to endurance. Even the barristers in the space between him and the judge turned round to gaze at him, and the judge himself adjusted his spectacles upon his nose to regard him with a searching look. Not a sound was to be heard except the monotonous voice of the clerk reading the indictment; it was plain that every one of that vast concourse knew him, and needed not that his neighbor should whisper, "That is he." Was his mother there? thought Richard, and above all, Was Harry there? He looked round once upon that peering throng; but he could catch sight of neither. The former was a thick veil over her features, was, indeed, watching him from a corner of the court; but of the latter he recognized was that of his attorney, seated immediately behind a man with a wig, whom he knew by instinct to be Mr. Serjeant Bullen.

There was a sudden silence, following upon the question, "How say you, prisoner, York, are you guilty of this felony, or not guilty?" The turnkey by the prisoner's side muttered audibly behind his hand, "Guilty," and trifled on you to plead.

"Not guilty," answered Richard, in a loud, firm voice, and fixing his eyes upon the judge.

A murmur of satisfaction run softly though the court-house. His looks had informed the curious folks; they were afraid that he might have pleaded "Guilty," and robbed them of their fun. Not a few of the jurymen perhaps all the women, were also pleased upon his own account. But he was no prejudiced person than they could not choose but wish him well, and out of his peril.

Then Mr. Smoothbore rose, and was some time about it. He was six feet four inches high, and in manner as though you could never see the last of him. ("Oh, Jerrusalem, upon wheels!" was the remark that Mr. Robert Balfour muttered in hearing when some brawn afterward found himself confronted by the same gigantic counsel, learned in the law, as he was called upon by the millouth of a second the silvery accents of Mr. Smoothbore; others leaned back with looks askance, as though to concentrate their intelligence upon them; and the foreman held his head with both his hands, as if the whole portion of his person was not wholly under control, but might make some erratic start, and disgrace him into some prisoner's sentence. These honest men did not know Mr. Smoothbore, and thought (for the first five minutes) that they could sit and listen to him forever; before they had done with him they began to think that they should have to do it.

For be it from us to emulate the prolixity with which the learned counsel set forth his case; it must be conceded that he did not bang over it; his words ran as smoothly as oil, and with a perfect distinctness, and if any one missed his meaning, it was not for want of its being sufficiently expressed. To a listener of average acility, however, he became unintelligible by repetition, which is, unhappily, not exclusively "the vice of the pulpit." We will take care to avoid his error. It will be sufficient to say that when he had finished Richard stood accused not only of having stolen two thousand pounds from John Trevethick, but of having compassed that crime under circumstances of peculiar baseness. He had taken advantage of his superior attentions, manners, and appearance, to impose himself upon the honest Cornishman as the legitimate son of his landlord, and acted with such that humble home a footing of familiarity, only the latter to compass a scheme of villainy, which must have occurred to him at a very early period of their acquaintance. Indeed, Mr. Smoothbore hinted that the prisoner's profession—photographic painting was a mere pretense and pretext, and that it was more than probable that having learned by some means of Trevethick's board, he had come down to Gethin with the express intention of becoming acquainted with it, which his subsequent discovery of the secret of the letter padlock enabled him to do. In short, by artful insinuation and this or that part of the story, Richard was painted as a common thief, whose possession of such faculties as writing and finesse only made him of a more dangerous enemy of society. There had been rumors, Mr. Smoothbore admitted, of certain romantic circumstances connected with the case, but he was instructed to say that they were wholly baseless. And that the matter which he purposed, as usual, in an order in inverse ratio to the interest and importance of their statements testimonies—the clerk of the Miners' Bank into whose hands the notes had been paid, policeman, Mr. Dodge, and others, who only corroborated what we already know. Even the appearance of Solomon Cox was marked by impressive dignity, save to the eyes of the accused. In the triumphant bearing of this witness, and in the malignant glance which he cast from time to time at the dock, I gan his tale, Richard read that the charge against him was to be pressed to the fullest extent. It was in this man's power, more than in any other's (save one), to extenuate or to set down in malice; and there was no doubt in the lad's mind though his rancor took so blunt a form that it might well have been mistaken by others for outspoken candor) which of the two courses Solomon had chosen. He showed neither scruple nor hesitation; every word was delivered with decisive, and on one occasion (though the repetition of it was forbidden by the judge) even accompanied by a blow with his inkstand-lid—not fist in the way of corroboration. It seemed that the story he had to tell was, after all, a very plain one.

When John Trevethick, who was the last witness examined for the prosecution, stepped into the box, this feeling was intensified. His gaunt frame and massive features seemed unconsciously to associate themselves with a plain story; and his evidence was as much in consonance with his counsel's speech as evidence could be with anything.

But when he had quite done with his unvarnished tale, and when Mr. Smoothbore had given him a parting nod in sign that he had done with him, Sergeant Sawbridge, for the first time that day, an uplifted finger, as though, but for that signal of delay, the honest landlord would have died incontinently, and hanged himself with his master Judas.

"You have a daughter, I believe, Mr. Trevethick?" and the Sergeant looked at the jury, with elevated eyebrows, as though he would have said, "If we can get even that information out of this hoary miscreant, we may consider ourselves fortunate."

And indeed John Trevethick did hesitate for one instant ere he replied. He had not even looked at the prisoner before, but at the question he gave an involuntary glance toward him, and met Richard's answering look. When two men are fighting, each with his hands upon the throat of the other, not for dear life, but for the hanged-for death of his foe, it is possible that in their faces some such inextinguishable hrid fire of hatred may be seen burning as that which leaped from witness-box to dock, from dock to witness-box; but scarcely under any other circumstances could such a look of deadly malice be exchanged between man and man. It passed, however, in an instant, like the electric fire, and was gone, leaving no trace behind it.

"I have a daughter," replied Trevethick; and as he spoke his face, though ashen of hue, took the same as blank and hard and meaningless as a wall of stone.

"This man is about to perjure himself," thought the experienced Mr. Balais; "and he looked around him with the air of a man who was convinced of the fact.

"The prisoner at the bar was, I believe, your daughter's lover, was he not?"

"Not that I knew of."

"Not that you knew of?" repeated Mr. Balais. "Will you venture to repeat that?"

"The witness and Jones," interposed the judge, demurely, and ordered a window to be closed, the draught from which inconvenienced him. Every body looked at the officials of the court who pulled the string and shut the sky-light, as though it had been the most ingenious contrivance known to man. Not that it was a relief to them to do so, but from that inexplicable motive which prompts us all to observe trivial circumstances with which they have nothing whatever to do, on any occasion of engrossing interest. Even Richard regarded this little process of ventilation with some curiosity, and wondered whether the judge would feel himself better after it.

"Oh, you didn't know of this attachment between the prisoner and your daughter at the time it was going on under your roof, but you have it of it afterward, did you?" was the next in the papers, I suppose, eh?"

"I heard of it, after the robbery was discovered, from my daughter herself."

"And, upon your oath, you did not know of it before then?"

"I did not."

"Your suspect it even, perhaps?"

"Nor even suspect it.

Mr. Balais smiled, shrugged his Demosthenes. His application of this way was Demosthenes. His motto was "Action, action, action." His friends on circuit called him the Balais of action.

He had had some experience of the depravity of human nature, said the shrug, but this beat everything, and would be most amusing but for its atrocious infamy. Good Heavens!

"Then you never had any conversation with the prisoner with reference to your daughter at all?"

"Never."

Mr. Balais bent down and interchanged a word or two with his junior, Mr. Smoothbore.

"Now be so good as to give me your best attention, Mr. Trevethick, for upon my next question more depends than you, perhaps, are aware of. If you have any regard for your own interests you will answer it truly; for as sure as fate"—

"Is this necessary, Brother Balais?" interrupted the judge, scratching his forehead with his forefinger, and looking up at the sky-light, as though that matter was not satisfactorily settled yet.

"My lud, I am instructed that nothing less than a cringing knee has been entered into against my unfortunate client."

The judge nodded slightly, shivered consistently, and made a memorandum of something that infernal draught before he should dismiss the ground up.

"I ask you, Mr. Trevethick," continued the counsel, solemnly, "whether or not, in a conversation which you had with the prisoner upon a certain day last month, you mentioned two thousand pounds as the sum which your daughter had in his possession before you could listen to any proposition of his with respect to your daughter's hand?"

"I did not."

"You never spoke of that peculiar sum to him at all?"

"Never at all."

It was Mr. Balais who looked up at the sky-light this time—as though he expected a thunder-bolt.

"Then, sir, of which we have heard so much, as being hoarded in this ingenious box of yours—and that you are very ingenious indeed, I must admit, there is no doubt—this box, I say, was kept in a certain cupboard, was it not?"

"It was."

"And now, please to look at the jury when you answer me this question—and look at me this particular question I instruct, Mr. Trevethick?"

Into the landlord's impulsive face there stole for the first time that day a flush, and his harsh, monotonous voice grew tremulous as he replied,

"The cupboard was in my daughter's bedroom."

"That will do, Mr. Trevethick," said Mr. Balais, observed Mr. Balais, with emphasis; "though I shall probably have to trouble you for seeing you another time"—and he glanced significantly toward the dock.—"is another place."

CHAPTER XXX

FOR THE DEFENSE.

When Mr. Balais rose again it was to speak for the defense, and he addressed the jury amidst an unbroken silence. So long had been the attention of his audience that the smack of a curter's whip, as he went by in the street below, was resented by them as much as an impertinent intrusion; until even the quarters of the church clock to which the prisoner had given first its iron tongue should drown a single sentence. This latter interruption did not, however, occur during the first few words of the speech as he was energetic in action. He began at once quietly to point out the weakness of the prosecution had proved—that the notes had been taken from Trevethick's box, and found in the prisoner's possession, but that nothing had been the very act of endeavoring to change them for those of another banking-house. But while he maintained was, that this exchange was not, as Mr. Smoothbore had suggested, effected for the purpose of obtaining the prisoner's hand by throwing dust in the prosecutor's eyes. He had engaged the manner only with the intention of returning his own money to Trevethick under another form. Even so young a man, and one so thoroughly ignorant of the world as to the ways of business matters as was his client, must surely have been aware, if using the money for himself had been his object, that it could be traced in notes of the Mining Company as easily as in notes of the Bank of England; nay, by this very proceeding of his, he had even given them a double chance of being traced. This, gentlemen, was not theirs, of course, to justify the conduct of the prisoner at the bar. It was unjustifiable, it was reprehensible, it was all that could be, but what he did maintain was that, even taking for granted all that had been put in evidence, this young man's conduct was not criminal; it was not that of a thief. He had never had the least intention of stealing this money; his scheme had been merely a stratagem to obtain the object of his affections for his wife. This Trevethick was a hard and grasping man, and it was necessary for the young fellow to satisfy him that he was possessed of certain property before he would listen to any proposition for his daughter's hand. His ideas—wrong and foolish one, indeed, but then look at his youth and inexperience—was to impose upon this old miser, by showing him his own money in another form, and then, when he had gained his object, to return it to him. Mr. Balais was, for his own part, as certain of such being the fact as that he was standing in that court-house. Let them turn their eyes on the unhappy prisoner in the dock, and judge for themselves whether he looked like the mere felon which the learned lad pointed him out for, or the romantic, self-deceiving, thoughtless lad, such as he (Mr. Balais) felt convinced he was. They had all heard of the proverb that all things were fair in love as in war. When the jury had known young themselves perhaps some of them had acted upon that theory; at all events, it was not an unnatural idea for young people to act upon. Mr. Trevethick was always a certain weight and authority of their own. They were not necessarily bound to take his word for it, but they certain whether the proverb in question was one of Solomon's own or not, so he put it in this gentleman's mouth, but they smacked of it. This Richard Yorke, perhaps, had thought it no great harm to win his love by a false representation of the state of his finances. He could not see his way how otherwise to melt the stony heart of this old curmudgeon, who had doubtless—not withstanding the evidence they had heard from that able clerk—encouraged the young man's addresses so long as he believed him to be Mr. Carew's lawful heir. The whole question, in fact, resolved itself into that of motive. If there was not a word of evidence forthcoming upon the prisoner's part, he (Mr. Balais) would much left him rest on the jury's hands, with the confident conviction that they would never inflict upon a misguided boy—who had already suffered such tortures of mind and body as were more than a sufficient punishment for his offense—the infamous and shameful crime of which he stood accused. He had lost his position, he had lost his mistress, he had lost his own heart, for they had all heard that day that she was about to be driven into wedlock with his friend, a man twice her age and more; he had had the protection of his father—his own flesh and blood—driven with miserable occurrence he had chosen to drown him; and yet here was the prosecutor, who had lost nothing (except his own self-esteem), in the respect of all who had listened to his audacious testimony that morning; pressing for a conviction, for more punishment; in a word, for the gratification of a mean revenge. If he (Mr. Balais) had nothing more, therefore, to urge in his client's favor than that he had been content to leave the jury to deal with this case—Eaglehaven, who detested oppression, and hated that justice only which is tempered with mercy. But as it so happened, there was no need thus to appeal to it; no necessity to appeal to mercy at all. He had only to ask appeal for the barest justice. He was happily in a position to prove that the prisoner at the bar had no more stolen this two thousand pounds than their own daughter had stolen their fortune man.

A sigh of relief was uttered from a hundred gentle breasts. "We are coming to something at last," it seemed to say. A hundred fair faces looked at Mr. Balais—who was growing gray and wrinkled, had found every new performance of his pantomime harder and harder—as though they could have kissed him, nevertheless. "Yes, gentlemen of the jury, that money was given to him by the prosecutor's daughter with her own hand."

A murmur of satisfaction ran round the courthouse.

There was a romance—a love-story—in the case, then, after all.

Mr. Balais concluded a most energetic speech with a peroration of great brilliancy, in which Richard and Harry were exhibited like a transparency in the bright colors of Youth, and Hope, and Passion, and finally set down amidst what would have been a burst of applause but for the harsh voice of the usher stepping it in the bud by proclaiming silence.

The only reason for his doing that when Mr. Balais jumped up to his feet again, as though he were an springs, and called for Harry Trevethick. The jury were taking snuff at the time; and such was the stillness that you could hear the crepitation of the nose-powder before any one of which he wrote down his notes. There was a minute's delay, during which every eye was fixed upon the witness-box, and then Harry appeared. She was very pale, and wore a look of anxious timidity; but a bright spot came on her cheeks as she turned her face to the prisoner in the dock, and smiled upon him. From that moment Richard felt that he was safe. Guarded as he was, and still in peril, he forgot his dungeon, and once more could feel that he would cheer to this tender creature, to whom he was about to owe his safety, to his life's end.

Harry was dressed most attractively attired in a pale violet silk dress, with a straw bonnet trimmed with the same modest color. It was observed, with reference to this and to the innocence and gentleness of her expression, that she looked like a dove; and a dove she seemed to Richard, bringing him the signal that the flood was abating, the deep waters of which had so nearly overwhelmed both soul and body. Even the judge, as Mr. Wensel had foretold, regarded her through his double glasses with critical approval; for a most excellent judge he was—of female attractions.

Mr. Balais smiled triumphantly at the jury. "I had not tell you," he seemed to say, "that my client is guiltless in this matter? Here is Truth herself come to witness in his favor. Bless her!" Richard's feverish eyes were fixed upon her; he knew no God, but here was his spring in the wilderness, his shadow of the great rock in a weary land. And for her, she looked only at the judge, expecting—poor little ignoramus—that it was he who would question her.

"You are the daughter of John Trevethick, of Gethin?" said Mr. Balais.

This interrogatory, simple as it was, made her color rise, coming from that unexpected quarter.

"Yes, Sir."

"He keeps an inn, does he not;" he—here Mr. Balais affected to consult his brief, to give her time to recover herself from her modest confusion—"the Gethin Castle, I believe?"

"Yes, Sir."

"The prisoner at the bar has been staying there for some months, has he not?"

She stole another look at Richard: it spoke as plainly as looks could speak, "Oh yes; that is how I came to know and love him." But she only murmured, "Yes, Sir."

"Speak up, Miss Trevethick," said the counsel, somewhat sharply; "these twelve gentlemen are all very anxious to hear what you have to say."

The judge nodded and smiled, as though in corroboration, as well as to add, upon his own account, that it would give him also much pleasure to hear her.

"Was the prisoner staying in the inn as an ordinary guest, or did he mix with the family?"

"He was in the bar parlor most nights, Sir, along with father and me and Richard."

"He was in the bar parlor most nights," repeated Mr. Balais, significantly, for he was aware now that the jury should catch that answer—"with father and me and Solomon." And he introduced him into the picture.

"Father brought him first, Sir, on the second day after he came to Gethin."

"Father brought him in, did he? Now, that is rather an unusual thing for the landlord of an inn to do, is it not? To introduce a young man whom he had known but twenty-four hours to his family circle, and to the society of his daughter?"

"Please, Sir, I don't know, Sir."

"No, of course you don't, Miss Trevethick; how should you? But I think the jury know. You have no idea, then, yourself, why your father introduced this young gentleman to you so early?"

"Father said he was a friend of Mr. Carew's, of Cromjohn, who is father's landlord."

"Just so," said Mr. Balais, with another significant glance at the attentive jury. "Mr. Trevethick had already discovered that this youth was of a good social position, and likely to prove an excellent match. 'Will you walk into my parlor?' said the spider to the fly: 'I have the prettiest daughter that ever did sup.' Eh?

Every body tittered at this except Mr. Smoothbore and his solicitor; even the judge blew his nose.

"Now, not only did the prisoner at the bar spend most nights in the bar parlor, but, as I am given to understand, he spent most days there, or, at least, events, by secretly, did he not?"

"Father and Solomon were away most days, Sir, and so we wove left a good deal together."

"Just so. Your father took care to be away most days, did he, in order that you should be left a good deal together?"

Mr. Smoothbore started to his feet. "My lud, I submit," etc.; meaning that this was a mode of interrogating the witness that he could not submit to for an instant.

"Very good," said Mr. Balais, smiling. "I will not put the question in that form, then. The form is of very little consequence. You were left together, however, and the consequence was that you two young people fell in love with one another, eh?"

No answer. Harry was thinking of Solomon, to whom she was to be married within ten days, and hung her head.

"Come, did he fall in love with you, then? There was ample apology for it, I am sure, and he ought to be much ashamed of himself if he hadn't. Now, did he 'court' you? I think you must answer me that question."

No answer. Every eye was upon her, the judge's double glasses included. They might as well have been opera-glasses, she felt so hot and frightened.

"Come, did this young gentleman ever give you a kiss?"

"Yes, Sir," murmured poor Harry, almost under her breath.

"Did you say 'Yes' or 'No?'" inquired the judge, dipping his pen in the ink.

"I said 'Yes,' my lord," said the unhappy Harry.

"There were more kisses than one, now, I dare say," said Mr. Balais, with a wink at the jury; "and they were not all on one side, eh?"

No answer.

"Some of them were on the other side, were they not? I don't mean on the other cheek, for I have no doubt he was perfectly indifferent as to that."

Again there was a little titter.

"She is your own witness, Brother Balais," observed the judge, "but it seems to me you are giving her unnecessary pain."

He had a very tender heart, had the old judge, where a young and pretty woman was concerned —otherwise he was a Tartar.

"My lad, it is absolutely necessary to prove that my client's passion was reciprocated. Did you ever return one of these many kisses, Miss Trevethick?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Did you ever meet him alone at night in a place, I believe, called the Fairies' Bower?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Yes," repeated Mr. Balsis, recapitulating these facts upon his fingers; "you were left alone with him all day; you met him alone at night, away from your father's roof; you returned his kisses: and all this without the slightest suspicion—if we are to believe his evidence —being aroused upon the part of your parent. Now, Miss Trevethick, you were aware that your father kept a large sum of money—these two thousand pounds—in his strong-box, were you not?"

"I was, Sir."

"Did you ever speak to the prisoner at the bar about it?"

"I think—yes, I did, Sir, on one occasion," and here Harry's voice fluttered and faltered. No one noticed it, however, except the prisoner; if any neighbor eyes had watched him narrowly —but they were all fixed upon the witness—they would have seen his face whiten, and his brow grow damp. Why should she have laid that stress upon "on one occasion?

"You told him that the two thousand pounds were in the box in the cupboard in your bedroom?"

"I did, Sir."

"The fastening of the box was not an ordinary lock, I believe. It was what is called a letter padlock?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Did you ever open it?"

"No, Sir."

A great lull seemed to be suddenly sat tolling in Richard's brain—it was the knell of all his hopes.

"You had never opened it at that time, eh?" continued Mr. Balsis, cheerfully. "But you learned the secret afterward?"

"I—yes—I did."

"Do you remember the letters that did open it?"

"Yes, Sir."

"What were they?"

"B, N, Z."

"Very good. We have heard from the counsel for the prosecution that they were so; and that Mr. Trevethick kept a memorandum of them on a piece of paper that fitted into his watch-case. Did he always carry that watch about with him?

"Not always. When he went out to market, and was likely to be late, he sometimes left it at home."

"In his own room, I suppose, where you or any body else could get at it?"

"I suppose so, Sir."

"You suppose? You know he did, do you not? Did you not open the watch-case yourself, and so discover the means of unlocking the box?"

"No, Sir," said Harry, faintly; and once more she turned her eyes to Richard. It was a true and tender glance, one would have said, and accompanied by an attempt at a smile of encouragement. But if it had been a glance of a gorgon, it could not have had a more appalling effect: it literally seemed to turn him into stone.

"Recollect yourself, Miss Trevethick," said Mr. Balsis, earnestly; "you are getting confused, I fear. Now please to give me your attention. You say that you knew that the letters B, N, Z were those which formed the key of the letter padlock, and yet that you did not open your father's watch-case. How, then, did you become possessed of the secret?"

No answer. Harry caught her breath convulsively, and turned deadly pale. She could never tell how Mrs. Yorke had endeavored to suborn her.
